John Stott and the Lausanne Movement

John Stott died on the afternoon of 27 July 2011, in the College of St Barnabas, a home for retired clergy, in Surrey. Obituaries appeared in all four leading UK newspapers on 29 July, where he was afforded more space than is given to most cabinet ministers. His global influence can be described only as colossal.

Few clergy become the subject of doctoral theses. John Stott’s life and work had, in his lifetime, already attracted over a dozen; there will be more, and doubtless a stream of further biographies. As decades pass, history will unfold the extent of his influence on theological thinking, on preaching, on the tensions between the gospel and culture, on the development of a Christian mind, on evangelical commitment to social justice, and supremely on world evangelization.

The calling, gifting, métier, of this unusually-able man was unique. He had no peer and, as Archbishop Peter Jensen said in the thanksgiving service in Sydney Cathedral, we should not look for a successor. In Vancouver, Prof J I Packer paid tribute to ‘a fifteen talent man’, and so he was. 1

If we were to abstract two major foci of John Stott’s ministry, consistently served through seven decades, they would be the student world 2, and the training of pastors 3; but to this must be added his contribution to Scripture Union 4, Tearfund, the World Evangelical Alliance; his founding of the National Evangelical Anglican Council (NEAC) and the London Institute for Contemporary Christianity; his concern that Christians speak into contemporary issues, including ecological questions; his model of preaching; and his extensive writing which merited its own published bibliography. 5 Alongside these lay his expert knowledge of ornithology, having personally sighted 2,500 of the world’s 6,000 bird species.

John Stott’s relationship with Lausanne 6, particularly in the period 1974-1996 could well be described as reciprocal, even symbiotic. His multi-faceted ministry fitted the multi-faceted Lausanne aspirations, which he had played no small part in fashioning. Lausanne channels and networks would become a major means through which he brought influence to the Church globally.

In 2006, Doug Birdsall, Lausanne Movement Executive Chair, invited him to accept a lifetime title of Honorary Chairman, which he did, with a sense of pleasure. It had been a consistent pattern to accept honorary titles only if he could maintain a lively link with the endeavour 7, and he followed news of planning for the Third Lausanne Congress with eager interest. Lindsay Brown 8 was appointed as Lausanne Movement International Director in 2007, and Chris Wright, 9 who followed in John Stott’s own stead as chair of the Lausanne Theology Working Group, 10 were both old friends. 11

Friendship featured highly in all John Stott’s ministry and dealings; he worked and he networked through friendship. This gift of friendship, combined with his interdisciplinary and enquiring mind, equipped him ‘to bring traditional Christianity to bear on science, medicine, contemporary thinking about war and nuclear deterrence, and such large questions. He was perhaps uniquely able to convene that largely private discussion [among] the upper echelons of science and medicine and the armed forces... as he laboured mightily to bridge the Christian faith community and the hottest of emerging issues.’ 12

Billy Graham and John Stott served together on a CICCU 13 mission in 1955, John as Billy’s chief assistant missioner. Three years earlier, he had himself been the missioner. The story is told of how they would go round and round in the revolving door of Cambridge’s University Arms Hotel, where they were both staying, each deferring to the other, so neither wanting to get out first! This well-rooted friendship drew John Stott into the early stages of planning for the 1974 International Congress on World Evangelization, held in Lausanne, Switzerland, and from which city the Movement would take its name. He was already regarded as a leader and figurehead, through participation in WCC events and in the 1966 conference on world evangelization in Berlin. The 1970s included seven or eight other international conferences. But from 1974, Lausanne was to have a lion’s share of his time.

Edinburgh 1910 — learning from history

The major missions conference in Edinburgh, in June 1910, convened by John R Mott, a visionary from the US Mid-West with a deep passion for evangelism, was a remarkable gathering by any criteria. But from the outset it was flawed through well-intentioned but ill-considered decisions. In a move to gain the participation of the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Randall Thomas Davidson, John Mott agreed that matters of doctrine would not be discussed. It was a costly error of judgment. He opened his final address: ‘The end of the congress is the beginning of the conquest’, and participants left on this stirring note, resolved to give their best energy to the glory of Christ in world evangelization. The two world wars would have a huge bearing on mission strategy. But the unforeseen hidden cost for including the Archbishop was regarded by John Stott as having even more profound, and longer-lasting, significance.

As central questions on the content of the gospel, the theology of evangelism and the nature of the church were not on the agenda, Edinburgh 1910 proved a lost opportunity to engage with the critical theological challenges of the day. Theological liberalism was to dominate in university faculties and in seminaries for the next several decades. As a result, mission became sidelined in the church. 14

Guarding Edinburgh’s intended legacy

The World Council of Churches, constituted in 1948, traces its roots back to Edinburgh 1910. But there is a sense in which The Lausanne Movement is the ‘spiritual legacy’ of that conference, taking forward John Mott’s true aspirations.

In 1974 clear action was taken in the formation of the Programme to reclaim what had been intended. This can be seen in the strength of the speaker list, and also in John Stott’s first plenary address, on ‘The biblical basis of evangelism’. 15 Thirty five years later, in 2009, the matter was still clearly on his mind. Doug Birdsall and Lindsay Brown conferred with him on several occasions as the Congress was being planned. He said he felt ashamed that leaders in his own communion refused to discuss doctrinal issues for fear of division. It had rendered
John Mott’s rallying cry as delegates left Edinburgh severely weakened. ‘You cannot speak of the gospel of Christ and the mission of the church without reflecting on biblical truth,’ he said.

Lindsay Brown’s Closing Address in Cape Town would leave no doubt about the clarity of vision and hope for Lausanne. The Congress was to sound ‘a ringing re-affirmation of the uniqueness of Christ and the truth of the biblical gospel and a crystal clear statement on the mission of the church - all rooted in Scripture.’ To launch a movement without biblical consensus was, he said, ‘folly’. The Cape Town Commitment drew evangelicals together around its biblical indicatives before moving on to its gospel imperatives. John Stott was actively engaged with Chris Wright on the way those biblical indicatives be crafted. 16 But let us not rush ahead.

1974 A Congress and a Covenant

From the 1974 Congress a winsome phrase ‘the spirit of Lausanne’ emerged. No one could be precise about its provenance, whether from Billy Graham (who himself was not sure), or simply as a phrase that was mused on by someone, repeated, liked and then adopted. The ‘spirit’ was exemplified by (i) prayer, (ii) study, (iii) partnership, (iv) hope and (v) humility. One could say that John Stott embodied it. He often referred to the phrase, and used it as a reference point for the Movement as it developed. Each of its components was, for him, of personal concern. To borrow Peter Kuzmic’s quip in 2007, John Stott ‘war ein Lausanner’.

John Stott’s reputation for clear theological thinking, his breadth of sympathy within the evangelical tradition 17 , and his gracious dealings with those of different persuasions, made him an obvious first choice to lead the process of crafting The Lausanne Covenant. 18

The Lausanne Covenant, which reflected the voices of the 1974 Congress, was adopted as a basis for hundreds of collaborative ventures over the rest of the century, and came to be regarded as one of the most significant documents in modern church history. 19 Social justice, too-long identified as a concern only for adherents to ‘a social gospel’ was now declared a biblical responsibility for evangelical Christians. This proved a watershed moment for the Church. Realizing the seriousness, of The Lausanne Covenant, John Stott worked on an exposition and commentary, published in 1975. It would, he sensed, be critical for the Covenant to be read and studied by individuals and groups. 20 His Preface is modestly written, and does not record the intense pressure of working through nights to ensure that all comments received from the participants were read and given proper consideration. It was a mammoth operation to translate them in a timely manner, but vital for the voices of the whole evangelical Church to be heard.

The name ‘Covenant’ was carefully chosen. This was a covenant with God himself, and a covenant between those who wanted to adopt it. The banner on the stage, in six languages, had proclaimed ‘Let the Earth hear His Voice’, and for that to happen, the whole evangelical church needed to work together.

The Covenant, in the words of Chris Wright, was ‘prophetic in the sense of speaking in a way which applied the Word of God to the realities of the hour. And it retains its relevance and challenge now, and indeed for generations to come.’ 21
He concluded: ‘May these creative combinations of confidence and humility, of human energy and trust in God, of vision and realism, of joy in the Lord’s doings and grief over our human failures, of strategic thinking and the spirit’s leading, of global vision and local action, of words and works — always remain characteristic of The Lausanne Movement as they are of its Covenant.’

In July 1989 John Stott led the crafting team for The Manila Manifesto in The Second Lausanne Congress (Manila, Philippines), which built on and elaborated The Lausanne Covenant. This Congress took place a month after what the Chinese government termed the ‘Tiananmen Incident’, and just three months before the dismantling of the Berlin Wall. It drew 3,000 participants from 170 countries including Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, but sadly none from China. The 31 clauses of The Manila Manifesto served to elaborate on The Lausanne Covenant. Lausanne II in Manila [as it became known] was the catalyst for over 300 partnerships and new initiatives, in the developing world and elsewhere.

Five years before Lausanne II, John Stott completed a new and groundbreaking book. Issues Facing Christians Today was a major contribution to evangelical thinking. It covered nuclear issues, pluralism, human rights, industrialization, sexual issues... It became a handbook for pastors and thinking church members, It was, he said, his contribution to the catching-up process’ since the Church was ‘recovering from its temporarily mislaid social conscience’. The Lausanne Covenant was continuing to create waves, reawakening a social conscience which had lain dormant in many quarters for perhaps two generations. The Lord Jesus had commissioned the apostles to teach new disciples ‘everything’ he had commanded them. This had plainly not been done. Indeed the Great Commission seemed, in evangelical circles, to have eclipsed The Great Commandment. In God’s grace, John Stott and The Lausanne Movement would become a means of re-establishing this significant aspect of Christian duty.

Establishing a Movement from a Congress

After the 1974 Congress, 70% of participants urged that a Continuation Committee be established, to build on what had been achieved. In January 1975 this group, appointed by the congress, met in Mexico City with Bishop Jack Dain in the chair. There was considerable support for Billy Graham to become President of the new Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization, as it was then named. John Stott urged that this not happen or that there be several Co-Presidents. Billy Graham had already articulated his preference that the Movement adopt a narrower brief of what we could call Proclamation evangelism. If this were followed, the Movement would reflect neither the scriptural mandate of the Church to be salt and light, nor its historical roots. On the strength of their 20-year friendship, John Stott, hating discord, felt the need to speak. Jack Dain was in agreement, while others could not bring themselves to voice anything other than blind allegiance to Billy Graham, given his worldwide stature. Some saw it as a power struggle. Billy Graham saw his mistake in yielding to pressure to accept the role. John Stott was asked to be on the drafting committee to prepare a statement on the progress of the meetings, which was accepted with only minor amendments. He described this in his diary as ‘a helpful note of unanimity on which to conclude a rather traumatic conference.’

When the Committee met the following year in Atlanta, four functions were identified, to achieve the Movement’s aim: Intercession, Theology and Education, Strategy and Communication. A working group for each was set up, and all four of these groups remain now. John Stott became Chairman of the Theology and Education Working group (later called the Theology Working Group).

As a backdrop to his preparation of Issues, John Stott continued to make Lausanne consultations a priority. Not only was he there, but frequently in the Chair. He edited the papers from all the consultations up to Lausanne II, published in 1996 under the title: Making Christ Known: Historic Mission Documents from The Lausanne Movement 1974-1989. As is clear from the contributors, Lausanne had the standing (helped, no doubt by John’s own presence) to draw the best evangelical thinkers globally.

The book opened with The Lausanne Covenant (1974) and finished with The Manila Manifesto (1989). Some papers such as the 1977 Pasadena Statement on the Homogeneous Unit Principle [ie of church growth and evangelization], and the 1980 Evangelical Commitment to Simple Lifestyle gained considerable traction. Shortly before his 87th birthday, he surveyed his years in Lausanne, and looked forward with anticipation to what Cape Town 2010 would bring. He said he felt the 1978 Willowbank Report on Gospel and Culture merited more attention than it had been afforded. This perceptive, urbane and erudite pastor, living just a few minutes from Oxford Circus, strove with all the energy God mightily inspired within him, as had his mentor the Apostle Paul, to preach relevantly; to apply the eternal to the temporal with skill; to grasp what lay behind people’s responses to the gospel. He worked to be anchored in the eternal gospel, and, for each decade and each context, to apply it - with intellectual and theological rigour, with perceptiveness, with cultural sensitivity and an eye to the future.

For as long as The Lausanne Movement was characterized by ‘the spirit of Lausanne’ John Stott sensed it was critically placed. Humility would always be needful. It was often said of Lausanne that its fruit ‘grew on other peoples’ trees’. It acted most effectively as a catalyst. Its platform drew and draws from across the divides of secondary issues, incorporating the evangelical Church in its widest sense — as a gathering to worship and grow; as specialised mission agencies to bring focused knowledge; as Christians in the public arenas of government, business, academia to shake salt and shine light; as believers North and South; in nominally Christian cultures and as minority groups under oppressive regimes, rich and poor... Through consultations, as leaders met face-to-face and got to know one another as friends, Lausanne would offer a unique means to share the gifts Christ gives to his Church.

Pastor-theologian

John Stott was one of the few true pastor-theologians. People mattered. We cannot strategize with integrity about world evangelization if we do not care about the people in our own town. John Stott was an integrated man. While a schoolboy at Rugby, he had founded the ABC Club as a way to provide a bath for vagrants. As a curate, he had taken boys from the poorer families in the parish for their first experience of camping. As a rector, he sometimes gave up his bed to homeless men, and slept on a camp bed in his study.

The neologism ‘glocal’ may have been coined in the context of globalization, hastened on by the digital world, but it describes the way John Stott had lived since the 1930s. It was a core value for him. As one of the world’s most effective global public evangelists, he cared for individuals locally, whatever their status. While Lausanne would always function at a strategic level, among theological thinkers, it would be of no more worth than a resounding gong or clanging cymbal if the benefit of its networking did not touch down in real life situations. At his funeral in All Souls, Toby Howarth, a former study assistant, related how John never tired of people wanting to talk with him, even after full days of ministry. When he broached this, the reply was, ‘Toby, I remember that God made them, Christ died for them and the Holy Spirit lives in them. How can I not give them my full attention?’

Four decades before ‘Fresh expressions of church’ appeared on the curricula of theological colleges, John Stott was already practising it. In 1958 the All Souls Clubhouse was opened, to welcome poorer families from the parish who would not feel comfortable in a church building. It was a church without pews; and a kind of forerunner of Willow Creek as a ‘church’ for the unchurched, though engaging a very different stratum of society.

Forming influencers

Forming the influencers of the next generation is a serious obligation for the Church. Pulpits in reach of major universities will always be strategic places for the gospel. In London in the 1970s hundreds of evangelical students poured into All Souls, including growing numbers from overseas, especially the former British colonies. Here they imbibed Scripture — and a model for the way it should be handled. John Stott’s gifting as an expositor, writer and thinker fitted precisely with Billy Graham’s aspiration for the 1974 Congress.

Invitations to speak at the 1974 Congress included some of the most able evangelical thinkers: Francis Schaeffer, Samuel Escobar, Jim Packer, Henri Blocher, the young Os Guinness, and the recent convert Malcolm Muggeridge. John Stott’s name had already become a byword for the diligent handling of scripture, and for a doctrine of scripture as a touchstone for all human experience and enterprise. His seminal address on the biblical basis for evangelism, opening with the dialogue on meaning between Alice-in-Wonderland and Humpty Dumpty, established itself as a classic treatment of core Christian thinking.

In Manila in 1989, John Stott gave the first three expositions, covering Romans 1-5, on ‘Eagerness to preach the gospel’, ‘The world’s guilt’ and ‘Amazing Grace’. (He loved the Pauline epistles, and friends joked that he understood Paul better than the apostle understood himself!) Like the Apostle Paul, he was ‘obsessed by the cross’.

Each morning he would greet the three Persons of the Trinity in turn, seeking genuinely to live as a son of his heavenly Father, as a sinner saved by grace, and in the power of the Holy Spirit, his advocate and counsellor. He always said The Cross of Christ (1986) was his most important book. As he prepared for his death, he asked that the words on his headstone, following his name and service at All Souls read: ‘Who resolved, both as the ground of his salvation and as the subject of his ministry, to know nothing except JESUS CHRIST and him crucified (1 Corinthians 2:2).’

A humble disciple

He was a humble disciple of Christ. In 2007, in an interview to mark the 25th anniversary of the London Institute for Contemporary Christianity, he was asked by Brian Draper how he would most like to be remembered. He was by this stage starting to speak slowly, and occasionally faltering, but there was no hesitation in the content of his response. ‘As an ordinary Christian who has struggled to understand, expound, relate and apply the Word of God,’ he said.

For over 50 years he read the whole Bible through annually, using Robert Murray McCheyne’s reading plan. ‘Nothing has helped me more than this,’ he said ‘to grasp the grand themes of the Bible.’ It became his pattern to rise early to read and pray, and to listen to the BBC World Service news. Listening to God through scripture should not be removed from world events. We must practise ‘double-listening’, he would say, so we can apply the Word to the world.

Cape Town 2010

John Stott and Billy Graham both sent greetings to The Third Lausanne Congress. John would have loved to be there, and briefly considered the possibility, despite his advancing frailty. He wrote:

‘I shall be very sorry to miss being with you in Cape Town. But I will be with you all each day in prayer, expectation and confidence as you plan to make known the uniqueness of Jesus Christ all over the world.’

Following a reflection on Lausanne since 1974, the growth of the Church, and his particular delight that the Congress was hosted in Africa, he concluded: ‘As you will be studying Ephesians together, my encouragement to you echoes the Apostle Paul. ‘I urge you to live a life worthy of the calling you have received. Be completely humble and gentle; be patient, bearing with one another in love. Make every effort to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.’

The Congress Programme Committee commissioned a special video tribute, reflecting his lifelong focus on Christ, from his conversion aged sixteen at Rugby School through the legendary public schools’ evangelist, EJH Nash, better known as Bash, a story he never tired of telling.

In late March this year, around a month before John Stott’s 90th birthday, Doug Birdsall called him. By this stage, his eyesight was failing badly, and he had not been able to read for several months, and was very frail. Doug was in Boston, and had just received his advance copy of the newly-printed Cape Town Commitment. Frances Whitehead had received John Stott’s copy two or three days earlier, and had begun to read it to him. When Doug Birdsall called, a friend, Phillip Herbert, picked up the phone. At John’s request he was at that moment reading it aloud, section by section, picking up from where Frances had left off.

In the historic line of The Lausanne Covenant, evangelical leaders in 198 nations were working to discern what the Holy Spirit is saying to the Church now on each continent, and the evangelical faith was being articulated for the current generation. It would be widely adopted, as the Covenant had been, and no one knew more clearly than John Stott the critical importance of getting it right. He had been praying for the planning, for the Congress itself, and for the writing of The Commitment. His words were halting, but his heart was full. The Commitment was in his view ‘profound and beautiful’. He went on, ‘And in it, you seem to have achieved an astonishing degree of unity.’
There was a sense of the baton being passed on. As he had struggled over writing Issues Facing Christians Today, he had felt ‘caught between two worlds’ with the text of scripture on one hand, and ‘space probes and micro-processors’ on the other. ‘They are centuries apart,’ he wrote in the Foreword. ‘Yet I have sought to resist the temptation to withdraw from either world by capitulation to the other.’ The Commitment, he sensed, stood with him, urging the evangelical Church to fill the breach.

Each of the ministries and endeavours with which John Stott had been closely associated was part of the Cape Town Congress. All his concerns, in which he had yearned for evangelicals to engage, were clearly laid out — not just in a document, but in a Commitment, firmly rooted in God’s covenantal love. He had heard plans for global consultations on major areas in the Commitment, to take matters forward. No doubt there was a sense of completion as he listened to it being read, while sensing he would soon be with Christ.

2 From his undergraduate days in the CICCUC, he maintained a close friendship with Oliver Barclay. He regarded Douglas Johnson, founding General Secretary of the Inter-Varsity Fellowship (now UCCF) as the greatest single influence on UK evangelicalism, and was deeply committed to the global ministry of IFES, developing strong links with its first General Secretary, Australian Stacey Woods. Starting and ending in his Alma Mater (1952, 1977), John Stott led many university missions across the UK, and around the world. The IFES goal to make Christ known in every university in the world was, he said, ‘the most strategic work imaginable.’
3 The Langham Partnership, founded in 2001, drew together earlier initiatives of the Evangelical Literature Trust and a scholarship fund for the (largely post-doctoral) training of non-westerners who would return to teach in seminaries in their home countries. To this was added ‘Langham Preaching’ which now trains preachers globally.

4 He served as President of Scripture Union England and Wales 1965-1973. While not listing offices for each ministry, I have done so for SU, as special mention must be made of it. E J H Nash of SU staff (more commonly known as ‘Bash’) ran the Iwerne Minster camps for public schoolboys, and it was through Bash that John Stott was converted to Christ and nurtured as a young Christian. He always maintained that the greatest spiritual influences on his life had been ‘Iwerne and the CICCU.’

It took its name from the Swiss city which hosted the 1974 International Congress on World Evangelization, out of which the Movement grew.

11 While senior staff and board members of Christian endeavours often move, or are seconded, from one ministry to another, this is no more clearly illustrated than by Langham Partnership International, IFES, and The Lausanne Movement. Each owes a significant debt of gratitude to ‘Uncle John’; and their common values, not least of building and strengthening indigenous Christian leadership, has forged strong synergy among them around the world. In 1974, according to the church historian Ian Rennie, over fifty percent of platform speakers had a background in an IFES movement. In 2010 the proportion was equally high.

12 Prof Nigel Cameron in The Times (8 August 2011). He added ‘It struck me then [in the 1970s], and does more forcefully now, how his network of personal friendships, which snaked across the face of the planet, was both embedded in his character, and was more than anything else the key to his astonishing influence.’

14 In 1919 we see, by contrast, the resolve of undergraduates in Cambridge to maintain the centrality of the Atonement in their definition of the gospel. This led Norman Grubb and fellow CICCU leaders to sever the CICCU’s links with the nationally-respected Student Christian Movement. Their firmness led within ten years to the birth of the Inter-Varsity Fellowship in 1928 [now UCCF], and to the founding of Inter Varsity Press (IVP) in 1936. This publishing house has, through the endeavours of evangelical graduates, given rise to sister publishers in over 30 nations, covering much of the world. The founding of Tyndale House in 1944 is another direct outcome of the 1919 resolve. Under God, we now see evangelicals teaching in university theology faculties and departments across the UK and around the world.

Part I of The Cape Town Commitment is formed around an expression of God’s covenantal love.

This evangelical ‘breadth within boundaries’ continues to be a value of Lausanne. In Part I of The Cape Town Commitment the boundaries are clearly defined.

You can listen to John Stott’s presentation of The Covenant on the last full day of the 1974 Congress. He and his drafting team of Samuel Escobar and Hudson Armerding, assisted by JD Douglas and Leighton Ford, invited comments at each stage of the process. They received hundreds, from individuals and from national or regional groups. These were translated and all carefully considered, some, as he explains, cancelling others out. It was a finely-tuned and meticulous process. The Covenant truly reflected the mood of the Lausanne Congress as well as any single document could.

At John Stott’s funeral, His Honour, Judge David Turner, a long-time friend and advisor, spoke of John Stott kneeling to pray before he preached ‘in the scarlet cassock of a Queen’s Chaplain under a gleaming white surplice.’ He continued, ‘This was expository preaching of exceptional clarity and authority such as I had never heard. John treated us as intelligent people. He trained us in “thoughtful allegiance” to scripture. He moved us by his passion. He taught us “double listening” — the need to “hear” the Word and the world, and to find the connections. He abhorred in equal measure “undevotional theology” [mind without heart] and “untheological devotion” [heart without mind]. He was, as he liked to say, “an impenitent believer in the importance of biblical preaching”. We loved it!’
