BENJAMIN KEACH: ‘THE GLORIOUS LOVER’

An Analogue of ‘Paradise Lost’?

The Glorious Lover, Benjamin Keach’s\(^1\) divine poem first published in 1679, is to a limited extent derivative from and a popularisation of Milton’s Paradise Lost. It was issued in two books, which were each divided into eight chapters. Although the form and style are not commensurate with the grandeur of the theme, Keach nevertheless claims in the Proem that it is to be a history ‘such as not Greece nor Rome could ever yield’.\(^2\)

> So great the Subject, Lofty the Design . . .
> My Muse is rais’d beyond a vulgar flight.\(^3\)

Echoes of Milton’s introductory lines are present in Keach’s self-effacing statement of his inability to express divine truth. The ‘light’ motif is explicit from the beginning, but it has none of the power nor poignancy of the blind poet’s.

> High is my Theme, but weak and short my sight,
> My Eyes oft dazzled with Excess of Light.\(^4\)

Keach’s debts, however, go beyond Milton. The poem has several derivative lines, including a borrowing from George Herbert’s Perirrhanterium:

> A verse may catch a wandering soul that flies
> Profounder tracts and by a blest surprise
> Convert Delight into a Sacrifice.\(^5\)

Like Milton, Keach provides a prose Argument at the beginning of each section of his poem. Book I begins in Heaven, ‘the fair Regions of approachless Light’, where the Lord Jehovah expresses his design to dispose of his Son in marriage to a human soul.\(^6\) The rest of the poem is concerned with the wooing of this soul and the conspiracy of Satan and other infernal powers against the betrothal. Innocence and its loss in Eden are confined to some two hundred lines in the first chapter, and there is a triple coalescence of Eve, the Church and the Soul. It was not unknown for the biblical image of the Church as the Bride of Christ to be applied synecdochically to a single soul, sought in marriage by the divine Bridegroom. However, for the soul itself to be personified in the figure of Eve is unusual in seventeenth-century typology. In no place does Keach give her a name, although the description is clearly that of prelapsarian Woman:

> Within that Garden dwelt in Ancient time
> A very lovely Creature in her Prime,
> Mirror of Beauty, and the World’s chief glory.

This cursory treatment of Eve epitomises some of the weaknesses of the poem. Character delineation is weak and almost entirely generalised, and the description of locale and landscape lacks imaginative depth and scale. Paradise, for instance, is ‘a most choice and lovely Garden’, and that is all. More detail is given to the description of Heaven, but the language is unoriginal and Keach draws almost exclusively on biblical tropes, like ‘streets of gold’, ‘dazzling throne’, ‘all-charming quire’. The narrative action is similarly skimmed, and the Fall is accomplished in five lines:

> She did not long in this condition stand
> Before a cursed and most traiterous Band
KEACH: THE GLORIOUS LOVER

Of rebels, who shook off Allegiance
And 'gainst their Sovereign did bold Arms advance
Intic'd her to their Party.

There is no mention of Adam and, at this point, no reference to the specific role of Satan. It can be argued that Keach is focusing on different aspects of soteriology from Milton, but the subject requires a weightier exposition of the Fall. There are, then, some echoes of Paradise Lost in the first part of the poem, but they are very insubstantial ones. Milton’s Satan dominates the first books of Paradise Lost, but in The Glorious Lover Satan becomes a named participant in the action only after the Fall. Instead of subverting the innocent, he seeks to sustain the sensual pleasures of the captivated soul. The character is not imaginatively visualised, but it can be argued that the perspectives and proportions of Keach’s poem need to be different from Milton’s because the subject is not properly ‘paradise lost’. The main issue in the later poem is whether the Soul will respond to the glorious love of the Prince of Light.

Nevertheless, there are at least two features of The Glorious Lover which replicate the narrative of Paradise Lost and where there is more obvious borrowing by Keach. These are found in the protracted temptation scenes and the description of the powers of Hell in consultation. In the temptation sections there is first a recall of the event in Eden and then the contest between Jesus and Satan based on Matthew 4. The soul is exposed to the blandishments of an allegorical Sin, to whom Keach gives a masculine identity. Sin is presented as the bastard son of Satan, and he appears in the guise of a Cavalier gallant, with ‘false locks and borrowed garments’.

Then boldly sets upon her, and with strong
And sweet lip’d Rhetorick of a courtly tongue
Salutes her ears, and doth each way discover
The Amorous Language of a wanton Lover.

The wooing of the soul is in three stages. The Prince of Light first presses his claims, but appeals to his own merits, reversing the role of the traditional courtly lover:

although that I
No beauty can at all in thee espy
I love not as your Earthly lovers doe.

The Soul rejects the suit:

Far from his presence with delight she rouls
In filthy Puddles and in Loathsom holes.

The second stage is a proxy wooing by Theologue: he too is rebuffed. The consequence is that the Soul is pronounced guilty of high treason, arraigned and condemned to be buried alive. Theologue performs the same kind of expository and admonitory role as Raphael in Paradise Lost. As in Milton’s epic Adam is apprised of pre-history before Michael escorts him from Eden, so in The Glorious Lover the Soul is reminded of the Creation and Fall in the interlude before her trial. The third stage of the wooing results in the Soul finally being espoused to Christ. In Paradise Lost Appetite subjugates Will and Reason before Eve succumbs to Satan; in The Glorious Lover there is a similar tension between the constituent faculties of the Soul. Keach presents a discourse in which Judgment, Will and Conscience are eventually enlightened.

In comparing Paradise Lost and The Glorious Lover, one can claim only limited correspondences between the two poems’ temptation scenes. The debates in Hell provide more analogous links. Keach's prose Argument clearly suggests the derivative quality of his narrative:

Shewing what consultations there were amongst the infernal Spirits to bring Jesus, Prince of Light, under the power of Death, a Council called in Hell; the Princes of the fallen Angels in a deep combination against him, for fear their kingdom should fall, and the poor Creature be delivered. The grand counsel of old Satan is taken.

The arguments are predictable. Thus Beelzebub begins: 'My sentence is for War'.

In his advocacy he borrows arguments from Milton's Mammon and presses for an enterprise which will make our Kingdom rise

And re-throne us in our Antient Skies
To a great Height and flourish, as before.

Lucifer's proem seeks to emulate the rhetoric of Milton's Pandemonium, although such eloquence hardly fits the vagueness of Keach's setting or the general level of debate, which rarely rises above that of a cabal. The rhetorical flourishes are few, and therefore conspicuous:

Dominions, Pow'rs and Principalities
You all in danger are, awake and rise.

As in Paradise Lost, the issue is how assault might best be effected: is it to be 'by fraud or force'? Keach's Satan emulates Milton's and devises a stratagem 'to bring about the Ruin of our Foe', namely the subversion of one of God's subjects, in this instance Judas. Predictably Satan's counsel prevails and he flies to Earth to 'take possession of poor Judas heart'. Thus all the narrative elements of Paradise Lost are repeated, in the same order, but in different proportions: the infernal debate, the ascendance of Satan, the journey to Earth, Satan's adoption of a proxy agent, betrayal and death.

There is one other significant perspective which Keach, when he composed The Glorious Lover, shared with Milton. Both present the human dilemma from an Arminian theological position. Keach's later works have a much stronger Calvinistic emphasis. In The Glorious Lover both fallen and unfallen spokesmen assert the doctrine of free choice. Thus the Soul replies to Christ's approaches:

It lies not in your power, to command
Against my will . . .
Will you the liberty of Choice deny?

and Theologue reminds the Soul:

The Devil has no power to compell
Thee to have tasted this his poisonous Feast
But wilfully thou has God's Law transgrest . . .
Thou to thy self dost thy destruction owe.

The last edition of The Glorious Lover was published in 1764. It never achieved wide popularity, although Keach's allegory War with the Devil actually ran to twenty-two editions in a hundred years. The Glorious Lover has had no abiding appeal, and as a literary work its best claim for recognition is as an inferior analogue of Milton's great epic.
1. Benjamin Keach, 1640-1704, like John Bunyan, was a Baptist preacher of humble origins who became a successful and prolific writer. See Raymond Brown, The English Baptists of the Eighteenth Century, 1986.

2. cf. Me of these
Nor skilled not studious, higher argument
Remains
Paradise Lost Book 9:41-43.

3. cf. I thence
Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song
That with no middle flight intends to soar
Above the Aonian mount
Paradise Lost Book 1:12-15.

4. cf. there plant eyes, all mist from thence
Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.
Paradise Lost Book 3:53-55.

5. cf. A verse may find him, who a sermon flies
And turn delight into a sacrifice
George Herbert, Perihranthorium 5-6.

6. cf. Paradise Lost Book 6:600ff, the chronological beginning of the epic's action, where God declares his first decree in Heaven.

7. Keach’s perspective lacks the universal and generic quality of Paradise Lost. The Glorious Lover is an allegorisation of an individual Christian conversion.

8. Besides throughout the ruinated Land
A Black and fearful King had great command,
Who had revolted many years before
From his Liege Lord.
The Glorious Lover p.15.

The emphasis in Paradise Lost is different, since Milton removes Satan from Earth after Book 9, despite the biblical view of him as ‘prince of this world’. This device enables Adam and Eve to take centre stage in their search for selfhood. The main events of Keach’s poem are later than Milton’s. Satan now has possession of the Earth.

11. cf. ‘My sentence is for open war.’ Paradise Lost Book 2:51.

12. Milton’s Arminianism is well attested. I have argued elsewhere why God in Paradise Lost is a self-justifying Arminian. David Aitken, ‘Milton’s Use of “Stand” and the Doctrine of Perseverance’ in English Language Notes, Volume XIX No.3.

13. ‘As for Benjamin Keach’s War with the Devil and Travels of True Godliness, he thought they would both sell “till the end of time.”’ James Sutherland, English Literature of the Late Seventeenth Century, Oxford 1969.

In what seems to be becoming the standard work in this field, N. H. Keeble discusses four of Keach’s works but, significantly, does not mention The Glorious Lover. N. H. Keeble, The Literary Culture of Nonconformity in Later Seventeenth Century England, Leicester 1986.

WORKS CITED

Benjamin Keach, The Glorious Lover: A Divine Poem Upon the Adorable Mystery of Sinners Redemption, 1679.

DAVID AITKEN Principal Lecturer in English, S. Martin’s College, Lancaster

SUBSCRIPTIONS

After six years at the present level, subscriptions will have to rise in 1992. The rates that have been agreed are:

Personal £16.00
Ministers, students in the British Isles, missionaries £10.00
Libraries and trade £20.00
Life membership £160.00 (£100 for those over sixty)

UK taxpayers should make their subscriptions under covenant: forms are available from the Treasurer.