the University Teachers' Group (now the Higher Education Foundation). Through all these agencies a network of influence was created which embraced either policy-makers or those who would become policy makers, putting before them both the value source for action and realistic blueprints for possible changes.

The last section of the book looks at the significance of the story for the present day. The changes in social context are obvious. In the earlier discussions, the deployment of the concept of Christendom to denote a society which still represented some kind of Christian hegemony in intellect and culture, was widespread. Globalization and secularization both now make such thinking seem very dated, arguing rather for a Christian appreciation of what it means to live in a pluralist society. Prophetic witness may perhaps be more difficult on the eve of a new millennium, but the need for a championing of clearly-articulated values as determining motives for human action in a world governed by a New Utilitarianism, where technological and managerial solutions dominate, is everywhere apparent.

In the last full chapter Keith Clements, my predecessor in editing this journal, warns about undue nostalgia for a past age of influence. Instead he calls on Christian leaders today to recapture the innovative and risk-taking venturing into new territory which marked those here described, together with the patient development of mutual trust in developing effective collaborative modes of working together. This volume is both an important contribution to the intellectual history of our century and a challenge to engagement today.
