PREFACE

BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

The General Editor of The Cambridge Bible for Schools thinks it right to say that he does not hold himself responsible either for the interpretation of particular passages which the Editors of the several Books have adopted, or for any opinion on points of doctrine that they may have expressed. In the New Testament more especially questions arise of the deepest theological import, on which the ablest and most conscientious interpreters have differed and always will differ. His aim has been in all such cases to leave each Contributor to the unfettered exercise of his own judgment, only taking care that mere controversy should as far as possible be avoided. He has contented himself chiefly with a careful revision of the notes, with pointing out omissions, with suggesting occasionally a reconsideration of some question, or a fuller treatment of difficult passages, and the like.

Beyond this he has not attempted to interfere, feeling it better that each Commentary should have its own individual character, and being convinced that freshness and variety of treatment are more than a compensation for any lack of uniformity in the Series.

INTRODUCTION.

I. GALATIA AND THE GALATIAN CHURCHES.

The term Galatia is used sometimes to designate the Roman Province which was constituted by Augustus (B.C. 25), sometimes a more limited tract of country, which was occupied by, and took its name from the Celtic invaders, who early in the third century before Christ over-ran Asia Minor and finally settled in a central district of the Peninsula. In the New Testament the term is probably employed in the latter sense; and we may understand by 'the Churches of Galatia' the bodies of Christian converts established in the three principal cities of Ancyra, Pessinus and Tavium; 'perhaps also at Juliopolis, the ancient Gordium, formerly the capital of Phrygia, almost equidistant from the three seas, and from its central position a busy mart'. It is essential to a right understanding of the Epistle that we should ascertain all that can be known of the history, condition, and character of the persons addressed. Such an investigation will not only enable us to explain allusions otherwise obscure, but, by throwing light on the circumstances and mutual relations of writer and readers, will confirm our belief of the authenticity of the Epistle.

Of the original inhabitants of the district afterwards known as Galatia, history tells us nothing. But in very early times it was occupied by Phrygian settlers. Their first abode was probably the high lands of Armenia, from which they descended.

1 Lightfoot, p. 18. Livy, xxxviii. 18.
and gradually overspread the whole of Asia Minor. They were governed by chiefs, who are called kings by Roman historians. They were an unwarlike race, addicted to agriculture and especially to the cultivation of the vine. This last particular is not improbably closely connected with the cultus of Sabazius or Bacchus. This deity, together with Cybele (or Rhea), was held in high veneration among them, and worshipped with orgiastic rites, accompanied by wild music and dancing.

From the fact that St Paul wrote his Epistle in the Greek language, we might infer not only the existence, but the prominence of a Greek element in the population of Galatia at the commencement of the Christian era. The inference is confirmed by the name Gallogracia given to the country by the Romans, and by the testimony of monumental inscriptions. It is probable that after the death of Alexander the Great and the disruption of his Empire, many European Greeks had settled in various parts of the country under Antigonus and his successors. They would seem to have retained their distinct nationality for several centuries, and not to have become fused by intermarriage with the other races who occupied the territory conjointly with them.

Early in the fourth century B.C., the Gauls invaded Italy and sacked the city of Rome. These Gauls were a Celtic people, inhabiting the northern and middle parts of what is now called France. A century later another horde of the same race poured into Northern Greece, and a division of the main body crossed the Hellespont and overran Asia Minor. Here however, after a time, they met with determined and successful resistance. The tide of invasion was rolled back, and the invaders gradually confined within the narrow limits of the district to which they gave their name—Galatia, the settlement of the Galatae, Keltae, or Galli. This district was about two hundred miles in length, and “was parcelled out among the three tribes of which the invading Gauls were composed”—the Trocmi, Tolistobogii, and Tectosages. Each tribe had its chief town—Tavium, Pessinus, and Ancyra respectively. The restless spirit, characteristic of the Celtic race, which had impelled them to leave their distant home in Western Europe, manifested itself in their new abode. Unable to conduct fresh invasions, they hired themselves out as mercenaries to the Satraps of Asia Minor, and were thus brought into collision with the Roman legions under Manlius in the war with An­ tiochus the Great. The result was the subjugation of Galatia to the Roman power (B.C. 189). For more than a century and a half they continued nominally governed by native princes, but really subject to the sway of Rome. At length the throne becoming vacant by the death of Amyntas (B.C. 25), Augustus constituted Galatia a Roman province.

It will be seen from this outline of the history of Galatia that the population of the country, at the time when St Paul wrote, consisted of four distinct nationalities, Phrygian, Greek, Gallic and Roman. To these must be added a fifth—Jewish.
From the tenour of the Epistle itself we have a confirmation of what might have seemed in the highest degree probable a præori,—that a large number of Jews had established themselves in the cities and towns of Galatia. The fertility of the soil, the salubrity of the climate, the position of the district, intersected as it was by the great caravan-road which connected Syria with the Ægæan—all rendered it a tempting spot for commercial enterprise. Ancyra may have been, like its modern representative, Angora, the seat of an important industry—the manufacture of cloth from the silky hair of the goat. We know that a considerable trade in textile fabrics was carried on there. Such a region would offer great attractions to the Jewish settler who is always found in the marts of the world, wherever money is made or is in demand. A monument erected by the Emperor in the temple of Augustus at Ancyra still exists, on which was recorded the grant of special privileges to the Jews, who must have formed in number and influence a considerable element in the population of that city.

Such being the principal constituents of the Galatian people, we have to consider the aspect which it presented to the Christian Apostle as a field of missionary labour. In other words, we have to find an answer to this question, Of what materials were the Churches of Galatia composed?

It is remarkable that there is nothing in the Epistle which suggests the presence of a Roman element in these churches. In Galatia, as in Jerusalem, there were doubtless to be found not only "strangers of Rome" (Acts ii. 10) but Roman residents. But their individuality seems to be merged in their relation to the metropolis of the world. They were less the members of a nation than the citizens of an Empire, and if some Romans were to be found in the Churches of Galatia, their cosmopolitan character seems to have prevented any national impress being stamped by them on the Christian community.

With the other four nationalities which made up the population of Galatia the case is very different. Though we may not be able always clearly to distinguish between the Phrygian and Gallic elements in the Galatian Churches and the allusions to them in the Epistle, yet both existed and both are occasionally brought into marked prominence. The worship of Cybele and Dionysus, with its orgiastic rites and 'hideous mutilations' must have been the expression of the popular temperament, whether it had its origin in the country or was adopted and perpetuated there. And the danger of converts regarding such abominations with tolerance, and even of relapsing under the influence of habit and early association, must have been as great as that to which the converts from heathenism in our own day are exposed. Hence we find St Paul including in a list of the works of the flesh, "idolatry, witchcraft, drunkennesses, revellings". The two latter sins are indeed contained in a similar enumeration in the Epistle to the Romans. But we must remember that every form of foreign religion found a welcome and a home in Rome. The allusion in ch. v. 12 is doubtful; but if the view taken by most commentators is correct, the reference must be to the practice of the priests of Cybele, and will justify the inference that the worship of the goddess with its foul concomitants was still maintained in Galatia.

The presence of the Gaulish element in the population and Churches of Galatia is more distinctly recognized in the Epistle. The abrupt remonstrance with which the Apostle follows up his brief exordium points to that restless, impulsive fickleness\(^1\) which has been noticed by Cæsar and Tacitus as a common feature in the character of the Gallic tribes. The eagerness with which they embraced Christianity\(^2\); the enthusiastic welcome given to St Paul on his first visit; the jealous partisanship, to which perhaps the only parallel in the Apostolic Church manifested itself at Corinth; the susceptibility to personal influence; the readiness to run after any new teacher, to adopt any new doctrine on the score not of its truth but its novelty—these are characteristics of the Gallic race, depicted by ancient heathen writers, and illustrated by many passages in the Epistle before us. Comparing this letter with that to the Romans, while the doctrine taught is the same, and the subject treated of remarkably similar, we feel that the persons addressed are quite dissimilar, and if the absence of national features (noticed above) is conspicuous in the Roman Epistle, no less striking is the recognition of such features in the Galatian Church—a recognition wholly inartificial and undesigned, and which stamps the Epistle with the clearest mark of authenticity.

If the presence of a Greek element in the Galatian Churches is less sharply defined, yet from the fact that the vehicle employed by St Paul for communicating his thoughts was the Greek language, it is reasonable to conclude that it was a language ‘understood’ of the people, even if not generally spoken by them. There is nothing however in the Epistle itself to indicate the presence in Galatia of a large number of Greeks of pure blood—indeed they were probably less numerous here than on the western shores of Asia Minor.

But the most prominent among the nationalities which St Paul encountered when he first visited Galatia was the Jewish.

\(^1\) ch. i. 6, see note.  \(^2\) ch. iv. 13—15.
Doubtless here, as elsewhere, he commenced his work as a Christian Missionary in the local synagogue, to which, as a Jew, he found ready admission. That which had been the centre of his Divine Master's labours was the centre of his own and of the labours of his fellow Apostles. But the circle was enlarged with an ever increasing radius. Our Lord declared that He in His own ministry was 'not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel;' and when the Apostles went forth to preach the Gospel to every creature, not only did they begin at Jerusalem, but they everywhere followed the same law, offering the good tidings 'to the Jew first'. In Galatia, as at Philippi and Thessalonica, St Paul's first converts would probably be Jews, and Jews must have formed a large and important element in the Churches of Galatia. If in his controversy with them he constantly appealed to the authority of their own Scriptures, the Gentile enquirers could not fail to be impressed with the high value which the Apostle set upon the Old Testament, as God's revelation, and to become familiarised with those portions of it by which he confirmed his message. In this way we can understand how we not only meet with numerous references to and quotations from the Old Testament in this Epistle, but how the Mosaic Scriptures are interwoven with the whole texture of the Apostle's argument. Were it possible to unravel and draw out those Jewish threads, the fabric would be destroyed.

These considerations, while serving to elucidate the Epistle, may confirm our belief of its genuineness as a letter addressed by a man such as we know from independent sources St Paul to have been, to Churches constituted as we know that those of Galatia were constituted.

1 Acts xvii. 2—4.
II. St Paul’s Visits to Galatia.

The earliest mention of Galatia in the New Testament occurs in Acts xvi. 6. After the conference at Antioch, recorded in the xvth chapter, Paul, accompanied by Silas, started on his second missionary journey. He ‘went through Syria and Cilicia,’ ‘and came also to Derbe and to Lystra.’ Here they were joined by Timotheus, ‘and they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia, having been forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in (proconsular) Asia.’ From a comparison of this passage with the account of St Paul’s second visit (xviii. 23), we might infer that he went to Phrygia first on this occasion and then to Galatia, whereas the direction of his route was reversed on the second occasion. But it is possible that St Luke uses the expression, ‘the region of Phrygia and Galatia,’ to denote a tract of country, not very accurately defined, which embraced portions of both the districts of Galatia and of Phrygia. The notice of this visit is cursory and meagre. The inspired historian is silent as to the circumstances under which St Paul became personally known to the Galatians, the nature of his missionary work, and the duration of his stay among them. From the Epistle we obtain little additional information on these points, but that little is important. It would seem that the Apostle had no intention of stopping on his journey through Galatia to the Western provinces of the peninsula. But while the Holy Ghost forbade him and his companions to speak the word in Asia, God by His providence rendered it necessary for him to linger awhile in Galatia. An attack of bodily illness, of which we have no particulars, arrested his further progress. But though too ill to pursue his journey, his heart was enlarged and his mouth was open. He could not travel, but he could preach. We know not whether Christianity had already found its way to Galatia. Intersected by the great high road from the East to Europe, it may have been visited by some of those who were converted on the Day of Pentecost, and the good seed of the Kingdom may have been dropped and sprung up and borne fruit. But even were this the case, the Galatian Christians were a small band in need of instruction and confirmation in the faith. When St Paul proclaimed the Gospel in all its fulness and purity as a Gospel of grace, mercy and peace, bringing pardon to the guilty and salvation to the lost, he was enthusiastically welcomed. So far from being repelled by the condition of weakness and disease in which the herald of the Gospel appeared among them, the Galatian converts in the fervour of their new faith received him 'as an Angel of God, even as Jesus Christ.' As he set forth among them Christ crucified, they realised the blessedness which comes to the sinner by faith, and with hearts full of gratitude to the instrument of their conversion would have plucked out their eyes and have given them to him. When the Apostle left them they were running well the Christian race.

Three short years had not passed when a change had come over the Galatian Christians. Eagerly as they embraced the Gospel, so quickly were they prepared to abandon it for that which, if it could be called a Gospel, was a different one from that which they had received. The Jewish leaven acting on the fickle temperament of the Gallic race had corrupted the simplicity of their faith.

It seems from some expressions in this Epistle that this defection had commenced at the time of St Paul's second visit to Galatia1, which took place on his third great missionary journey. St Luke's mention of this visit is limited to a notice of the fact that after spending some time at Antioch 'he departed, and went through the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, confirming all the disciples.' From this statement we are warranted in concluding that the seed sown by St Paul on his first visit had sprung up with unexampled rapidity, and had not only produced the full corn in the ear, but sheaves of grain. Individual converts had multiplied, and had been gathered into Christian congregations—'the churches of Galatia'.

INTRODUCTION.

III. THE DATE, OCCASION, AND SUBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.

(a) Though we cannot prove with precision the time at which the Epistle was written, yet certain limits can be assigned within which the date of its composition must be placed. The allusion to the Apostolic Council (ch. ii. 1) shews that it must have been written after that event, which occurred A.D. 50; and the reference to St Paul's first or former visit (c. iv. 13 see note) points to a yet later date, A.D. 54 or 55; for the expression implies that a second visit had been paid when St Paul wrote.

It is argued with great probability that this Epistle was written about the same time as those to the Corinthians and Romans. From two allusions 1 which otherwise it is difficult to account for, it may be inferred (in the absence of direct proof) that the Epistle to the Galatians followed the 2nd Epistle to the Corinthians at a very short interval; while the striking resemblance not only in words, phrases, and quotations, but in trains of thought and argument, between Galatians and Romans points to the conclusion that the two Epistles were written consecutively, while the Apostle's circumstances were the same and his thoughts flowing in the same channel.

It may be convenient to notice these coincidences separately:

(a) The Second Epistle to the Corinthians contains directions for the treatment of the incestuous person—a plea for his forgiveness and restoration. In our Epistle (ch. vi. 1) we read, 'Brethren, even if a man be overtaken in any transgression, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness.' This exhortation, introduced without preface or connexion with the context, is just what might have been expected if St Paul wrote while the case of the Corinthian offender was fresh in his mind. And the tenderness of his tone here is in deepest harmony with the reason he assigns there for leniency, 'lest such an one be swallowed up by over-much sorrow.'

(b) Again, in ch. vi. 7 foll. we have an exhortation to liberality abruptly introduced with the words, 'Be not deceived;

1 Bp. Lightfoot, p. 53.
2 2 Cor. ii. 7.
God is not mocked. Now we learn from 1 Cor. xvi. 1, that St. Paul had sent directions to the Churches of Galatia respecting contributions for the relief of the poor saints in Jerusalem. He had kept up communication by messengers with the Galatian converts during the time which had elapsed since his last visit, and it would seem that he had heard of their want of liberality, as well as of their departure from the simplicity and purity of the faith. How natural is the rebuke, when the circumstances which provoked it are thus explained! Such circumstances, coincidental rather than accidental, corroborate the view which has been adopted of the close connexion of the Epistles in order of time.

(c) Many commentators have collected the parallel passages which occur in the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans, and to these the student is referred, as well-nigh forcing on the mind the conclusion that the latter Epistle was composed very shortly after that to the Galatians of which it is the outgrowth and expansion. The brief, though pregnant, statement of doctrine which arises in the one case out of the condition of epistolary correspondence is developed in the later letter into a treatise so full as to be well-nigh exhaustive. But it is not so much by a comparison of detached passages—striking as is the resemblance (in many cases the identity) of expression—as by a careful study of the subject-matter of the two Epistles, that we are led (in the absence of direct historical evidence), to place the date of the Epistle to the Romans as the latest limit, subsequently to which the letter to the Galatians could not have been written. Now the time at which the Epistle to the Romans was written can be fixed with certainty, viz. early in A.D. 58, during the fourth year of the emperor Nero. And we may therefore assign the year A.D. 57 as the date of the Epistle to the Galatians.

1 For further instances see 'Epistle to the Romans' in this Series, by the Rev. H. C. G. Moule, Appendix K., p. 267.
2 See Bp. Lightfoot, pp. 44—47; 'Romans' by Rev. H. C. G. Moule, pp. 29, 30, where the passages are 'arranged under doctrinal heads.'
3 In determining the date of the Epistle no allusion has been made to the expression 'so soon' in ch. i. 6. Great stress has been laid on
(d) The place at which it was written cannot be assigned with certainty. The subscription in the A. V., according to which it was 'written from Rome,' rests on no early MS. authority, and is certainly wrong. We know that after his second visit to Galatia St Paul went to Ephesus, and there abode for the space of two years (Acts xix. 1, 10), i.e. from A.D. 54 to 56 or 57. Here he would readily receive tidings of the Churches of Galatia, and from Ephesus most probably he addressed his Epistle to them. This is the view of Dean Alford, Dr Schaff and others. From Ephesus, however, he went by Macedonia to Corinth, and it is quite possible that the letter may have been sent from Corinth, where he spent part of the winter of A.D. 57—58. This finds favour with Conybeare and Howson (ii. p. 136), and was held by Grotius. Or we may adopt the conclusion arrived at by Bp. Lightfoot after a careful consideration of all the probabilities—they amount to no more than probabilities—of the case, and suppose it to have been written 'on the journey between Macedonia and Achaia.' The question is one on which it is impossible to pronounce with certainty, and, whatever interest may attach to it, is one of minor importance.

(2) Our Lord declared that He came not to destroy the Law or the Prophets, but to fulfil them; and the Gospel preached by Himself and His Apostles was in perfect agreement with the older Revelation, of which it was the spiritual explication. Every Jew who was 'instructed unto the kingdom of heaven' recognised this truth, and accepted the Apostolic teaching, not as an addition to, much less as opposed to, the teaching of Moses and the prophets, but as its development and accomplishment. Hence, as regards those Jews who embraced Christianity, we find no trace in the New Testament of any call to leave the Church of their fathers or to abandon the ritual im-this by some editors. But its importance disappears if the view taken in the note on the passage is correct—that the adverb which is rendered 'soon' here, as in 2 Thess. ii. 2, is not a particle of time, but is equivalent to 'readily, hastily, or rashly.'

1 Matt. v. 17.
2 Matt. xiii. 52. 'Made a disciple to.' R. V.
posed on them by God Himself. But the case of the Gentile converts was different. The Mosaic law had not been given to them, and they were under no obligation to comply with its precepts. Such compliance in itself might be harmless, but it formed no part of that new Covenant into which they entered at their Baptism—a new covenant as contrasted with the Mosaic, but really the same covenant which God made with Abraham, a covenant in which all nations were to be blessed, and which the Law ‘which came four hundred and thirty years after’ could not disannul. And if conformity to the ceremonial law was made binding on them as a condition of salvation, it could only mean that faith in the Lord Jesus Christ was not sufficient, and so virtually that human merit must be added to the efficacy of Christ’s death to make it complete as a satisfaction for human sin.

Now it was not unnatural that this recognised difference between the position of the Jewish and Gentile converts should have caused a feeling of jealousy in the minds of such of the former as did not understand the spiritual unity which existed under the apparent diversity. Zeal for the letter of the Old Testament Scriptures, national prejudice and religious exclusiveness, the fact that the Apostles were Jews—one ‘a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee’—that they always appealed to the Old Testament as the inspired and final authority in matters of religion, nay that these Apostles themselves did in certain instances sanction the compliance of Gentiles with the requirements of the ceremonial law—all these things would combine to produce the demand on the part of Jewish converts that their Gentile brethren must conform to the Mosaic ceremonial law, and in fact become proselytes as a condition of becoming Christians.

1 In Acts vi. 7 we read, that ‘a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith,’ but neither here nor elsewhere is any hint given that they were required to discontinue their priestly functions or to cease from executing their office before God in the order of their course. It was not until this became no longer possible, when the Temple was destroyed and God by His Providence dispensed with obedience to the Law by making obedience impossible—then and not till then was the obligation relaxed by the same authority (though not by the same means) by which it had been imposed.
INTRODUCTION.

This 'zeal' which had manifested itself in Judæa and afterwards at Antioch was quite independent of local influences. It made its appearance wherever there was a considerable Jewish element in an infant Church, and soon began to show itself in the Churches of Galatia. Here its error found a congenial soil in which to strike root and spread. The impulsiveness of the Gaul led him to accept without consideration the latest dogma, if only it was propounded loudly and in a tone of authority; and while many were drifting without compunction from the truth on which their souls had anchored under the pilotage of the Apostles, the faith of the Church itself was in danger of being fatally corrupted.

The Judaizing party in Galatia felt that one obstacle stood in the way of the success at which they aimed—the personal authority and influence of St Paul. The founder of the Christian communities of Galatia had at his second visit repeated the clear and explicit proclamation of salvation by faith in Christ apart from the works of the law, and he had probably continued by messages to shew his interest in their spiritual welfare and to be a helper of their faith. Hence the Judaizers sought to weaken his influence by disparaging his authority. They denied his Apostolic call. He was not one of the Twelve, and might be supposed to have learned the doctrines which he taught, and even to have derived his commission from those who were the personal companions of the Lord Jesus. If therefore the truth of the Gospel were in question, the appeal would lie to Peter and James and John, who were of reputation as pillars of the Church. But not content with thus directly impugning St Paul's authority, the Judaizing party insinuated that his own conduct was inconsistent with his teaching. Had he not circumcised Timothy at Lystra 'because of the Jews that were in those parts'? Had he not in compliance with the advice, if not in obedience to the direction of James paid the expenses of four men which had a vow on them? And was not this a recognition of the ceremonial law? Such insinuations were easily made; and while not denying the facts alleged, St Paul was prepared with an answer to the conclusions which his opponents drew from them. He devotes the first division of his Epistle to the vindication of his Apostolic authority against those who denied his Divine Commission and those who disparaged his teaching on the score of personal inconsistency. But this vindication of himself was only preliminary to the re-assertion and complete vindication of the doctrine which he taught. He knew that the real point at issue between him and his opponents was not whether the rite of circumcision was or was not imperative on Gentile converts. He did not mistake the symptom for the disease, or lose sight of the great fundamental principle of the Gospel, while considering its application to a particular case.

2 Acts xv. 1 foll.
3 Acts xvi. 3.

Nothing less was at stake than the ‘truth of the Gospel’ (ii. 5). The question of questions, rising up from the heart of man from the Fall onwards—the question which implies that God is a righteous lawgiver and judge, and that man is a conscious sinner—finding expression in the Old Testament in the words, ‘How can man be just with God?’ and in the New Testament, ‘What must I do to be saved?’ has its answer complete, certain, universal, ‘Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.’ This answer, though more definite as regards the object was in principle the same in every age. In Patriarchal days, ‘Abraham believed the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness.’ Under the Law it was declared that ‘The just shall live by faith.’ The Law did not disannul the earlier covenant. It was added because of transgressions to pave the way for the revelation of Jesus Christ—the seed to whom the promise had been made. In Christ all external dis-

1 Acts xxi. 20—26. The vow was that of the Nazarite (Numbers vi.), and the ‘charges’ incurred were for the sacrifices (v. 14) which had to be offered. These charges were often defrayed by rich Jews on behalf of their poorer brethren.

2 It is interesting to contrast St Paul’s elaborate assertion and proof of his authority with the tone of conscious Deity which pervades the Great Master’s discourses. ‘He spake as one having authority.’
tinctions, whether of race or sex or social condition, disappear, and they who are Christ's are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

This assertion of the great doctrine (which Luther declared to be the test of a standing or a falling Church), that man is justified by faith apart from the works of the Law, has always been liable to abuse. Indeed, while some have inferred from it that the profession of a correct creed exempts a man from the obligation of the moral law, some men of saintly spirit, longing for deliverance from sin and earnestly striving after holiness, have hesitated to accept a Gospel which makes faith alone the condition of acceptance with God. Hence the Apostle concludes his letter with practical exhortations which shew the absolute necessity of good works, not as antecedent to, but as the fruit of faith. That which he commanded Titus to affirm confidently, he confidently affirmed himself, 'that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works.'

A brief analysis of the contents of the Epistle will serve to illustrate the foregoing general remarks. The train of thought and argument cannot always be traced with certainty. The style is rugged and abrupt, reflecting the strong emotion under which St Paul wrote. An attempt has been made in the notes to elucidate the connexion when it is obscure. Such obscurity does not affect the scope of the reasoning or the force of the appeals.

The Epistle lends itself to a threefold division, each section consisting of two chapters. The first of these sections is personal and in part narrative, and contains a vindication of St Paul's apostolic commission and authority. These established, the writer proceeds in the second section, which is doctrinal and argumentative, to deal with the main subject of the Epistle—the doctrine of justification by faith. Having thus laid a broad and strong foundation of Christian ethics, he devotes the third section, which is mainly hortatory, to the inculcation of those duties in which the Galatian converts were lacking and cautions against dangers to which they were especially exposed. The concluding verses of this section catch their tone from all that is gone before. The writer re-asserts his authority, re-states his doctrine, and reinforces his practical admonitions.

It is evident from the circumstances of the case that St Paul, while addressing all the professing Christians of Galatia, had specially in his thoughts the Gentile converts. They were called upon by the Judaizers to submit to circumcision and to keep the law of Moses. To them therefore, in the present instance rather than to the Jewish believers, must an appeal be made to stand fast in the truth of the Gospel. This will serve to explain the expression in ch. iv. 8, ‘When ye knew not God, ye did service to them which by nature are no gods.’ But the frequent quotations from the Old Testament and the conclusive reference to its authority clearly recognise the presence of a numerous and influential Jewish element in the Churches of Galatia.

IV. THE AUTHORSHIP AND CANONICITY OF THE EPISTLE.

The title of the Epistle in the earliest MSS. is ‘To the Galatians,’ without any mention of the name of the writer. That St Paul was the author of it has been held by the general consent of the Church, and admitted even by the most destructive of modern critics. This conclusion has been based on internal rather than on historic evidence. Even if no other writing of the great Apostle had survived, and such notices of his personal history as are preserved in St Luke’s narrative had perished, any intelligent and unprejudiced reader would have recognised the Epistle as the original and genuine production of a man named Paul. Every line bears the impress of truthfulness. The whole style and tone of the letter, no less than particular passages and turns of expression, rebut the suggestion of forgery. And when the Epistle is compared with the other writings attributed to St Paul, and with the independent account contained in the Acts of the Apostles, the conviction is well-nigh irresistible, that we have here an authentic letter written by St Paul to his Galatian converts. This conviction is strengthened, as we trace the suitability of the Epistle to what we know from independent sources of the character and circumstances of the persons addressed.

It is, however, noteworthy that while the internal evidence is thus exceptionally strong, the notices of the Epistle in early Christian writers are neither numerous nor direct—indeed, out of some half-dozen supposed references in the Apostolical Fathers, not more than two can be cited as altogether free from uncertainty. In the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, c. 3, we meet with this expression, 'Builted up unto the faith given you, which is the mother of us all.' Comp. Gal. iv. 26; and in c. v., 'Knowing then that God is not mocked,' &c. Comp. Gal. vi. 7.

Justin Martyr (A.D. 150) in his Dialogue with Trypho, ch. xcvi., after declaring that 'every race of man will be found under a curse' (comp. Gal. iii. 10), quotes the two passages from Deuteronomy which are quoted by St Paul, in such a way as to shew that he had a knowledge of this Epistle. In his first Apology, ch. lili., he makes the same use of Isaiah liv. 1, 'Rejoice, thou barren, that bearest not,' &c., which St Paul makes of it (comp. Gal. iv. 27).

Athenagoras (A.D. 176) employs this remarkable expression, 'The weak and beggarly elements' (Embassy, ch. xvi.), which he has evidently borrowed from Gal. iv. 9.

Several references to this Epistle are met with in the extracts from the writings of Gnostics and other heretics of the second century which have come down to us in various Apologies.

'The Epistle to the Galatians' is found in all the known Canons of Scripture proceeding from the Catholic Church in the second century. It is contained in the Syriac and Old Latin versions, completed, it would appear, early in the century. It is distinctly recognised also in the Canon of the Muría-

TORIAN FRAGMENT (probably not later than 170 A.D.)¹. From the end of the second century onwards the Epistle is referred to by name and commented on as the undoubted work of St Paul, and of canonical authority.

Among the numerous commentaries on the Galatians three may be named, representing three eras of the Church's history, and while differing widely from one another, yet each marked by a high degree of excellence and usefulness. Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia, early in the fifth century, Luther in the sixteenth, Lightfoot in the nineteenth, have each in different ways contributed important aid to the right understanding of the Apostle's argument, and the elucidation of his train of thought. Of the merits and the defects of Theodore as a commentator a careful and judicious analysis is given in Dr Swete's edition (pp. lxxv.—lxxvi.), 'He is unwearied in his efforts to grasp the precise meaning of words and phrases.' But at the same time 'his interest in the language is professedly subordinate to his interest in the thought which it enshrines. He is never weary of pointing out to the reader the undercurrent of close reasoning which pervades St Paul's letters.' 'He is practical as well as critical.' 'Theology in his eyes is paramount; and if he pays close attention to grammar and sequence, this is for the sake of the theological truths which he believes himself thus better able to elicit.' In marked contrast to this description stands the work of the great German reformer. The cardinal truth of justification by faith was, in Luther's estimation, the keystone of the whole Gospel edifice. He had found the doctrine 'very full of comfort.' It had saved him from despair. And he devoted his life henceforth to the task of asserting it in opposition to the current teaching of the day, 'He chose this Epistle as his most efficient engine in over-throwing the mass of errors which time had piled on the simple foundations of the Gospel.' Such was his love for it that he termed it, 'my own Epistle.' Hence, his Commentary, though polemical in tone, is really rather a diffused and exhaustive paraphrase, or a series of short expositions, than what is understood by a commentary. He takes occasion from St Paul's words to assert and re-assert, to place in varied light and under many aspects, and so to enforce the central truth alike of Pauline theology and of the Gospel revelation,—that man is justified by faith in Jesus Christ apart from the works of the Law, and therefore in no degree by his own works or deservings. Profoundly convinced of the vital importance of this doctrine, he catches the fire which flashes forth from the impassioned sentences of the Apostle—and while ruthlessly exposing and condemning error, he proclaims liberty and salvation to troubled consciences and sin-wearied souls.

Of the work of the late lamented Bishop of Durham it is enough to say that it stands unrivalled in every quality that goes to constitute a commentary for the use of scholars and the more advanced students of Holy Scripture. Learning, candour, judgment, lucidity of expression, deep piety and sympathy with the inspired writer—these are its characteristics. They are a measure of the loss which the Church of Christ has sustained, as of the debt she owes to the deceased prelate.

THE ASSERTION OF ST PAUL'S APOSTOLICAL AUTHORITY.

CHAPTER I.

1—5. INTRODUCTION. SALUTATION AND ASCRIPTION OF PRAISE.

1. Paul, an apostle. In the opening of this Epistle, as of those to the Corinthians, Ephesians, Colossians and Timothy, St Paul designates himself an Apostle. Elsewhere he either adds no descriptive epithet to his name, or he is a bondservant of Christ Jesus (Phil. i. 1), or of God (Tit. i. 1), or a prisoner of Christ Jesus (Philem. 1). In the present instance the addition is not without reference to the circumstances under which he wrote. His authority had been impugned, and a great fundamental doctrine of the Gospel perverted. The former must be asserted, that the latter may be maintained.

an apostle] Lit. ‘a messenger’. The title was given by our Lord Himself (Luke vi. 13) to twelve chosen by Himself out of the number of His disciples. The qualifications for the office are (1) a Divine call (Luke vi. 13; John xv. 16; Acts i. 2, 24); (2) a personal knowledge of the Lord Jesus, as the Risen Saviour (Acts i. 21, 22; 1 Cor. ix. 6); (3) the inspiration and infallible teaching of the Holy Ghost (John xiv. 26, xvi. 13); (4) a Divine commission (Acts xxii. 21, xxvi. 16—18). On the wider use of the term see Bp. Lightfoot, Gal. pp. 91—97.

not of men,...the dead] ‘Not of men’, rather, not from men. Unlike the false apostles, he did not go forth commissioned by men, as their messenger, or as deriving his authority from them; nor again was he sent ‘by man’ (abstract, not concrete; as in John ii. 25).
the dead;) and all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia: grace be to you and peace from God Paul commissioned others, because himself not commissioned by other men.

but by Jesus Christ] A clear proof of the proper Deity of the Lord Jesus. As Jesus was the source from which, so was He also the channel through which St Paul derived his authority. The occasion on which he received this authority was doubtless his miraculous conversion.
It is however instructive to observe that even this Divine call and appointment did not supersede the outward commission and ‘investiture’ ‘through the medium of the Church’ (Acts xiii. 2). The latter, while owing all its value to the former, is distinctly stated to have taken place by the express direction of the Holy Ghost.

“The Apostles are both ‘from Christ’ and ‘through Christ;’ their disciples (and all regular teachers of the Church) are ‘from Christ,’ but ‘through man;’ the false teachers are ‘from men’ and ‘through man.’ Paul’s call was just as direct as that of the Twelve; but the Judaizers, in their tendency to overrate external forms and secondary causes, laid great stress upon the personal intercourse with Christ in the days of His flesh, and hence they were disposed either to declare Paul a pseudo-apostle, or at least to subordinate him to the Twelve, especially to Peter and James,” Dr Schaff.

and God the Father...dead] It may at first sight surprise us that St Paul should thus closely unite God the Father with Jesus Christ, as the channel or agency by which he received his commission. But the difficulty is removed by the addition of the words, ‘Who raised Him from the dead.’ Christ was “declared to be the Son of God with power...by” i.e. as the result of “the resurrection from the dead.”
The hypostatic union of the Father and the Son is presupposed (John x. 30). “He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.” If then St Paul had received his apostolic commission ‘by’ the Risen Christ who “appeared to him on the way”, he might truly be said to have received it ‘by’ God the Father. Luther ascribes the addition of these words to St Paul’s “burning desire to set forth even in the very entry of his epistle, the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to preach the righteousness of God”. “He was raised again for our justification,” Rom. iv.

2. all the brethren which are with me] It is impossible to say with certainty who these brethren were. The expression, ‘all the brethren’ and the omission of any names, render it improbable that reference is intended only to Timothy and Titus. The words are intentionally vague, and certainly do not lend support to the view that St Paul “sought safety in numbers”. He knew that truth is generally with the minority. But he never forgot that he was a member of the Church, and not an isolated individual. The truth for which he contended was the birthright of his brethren, dear to them as to himself.

unto the churches of Galatia] The abruptness of the address is remarkable. No word of praise, no mention of privilege. Comp.
the opening words of the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Ephesians, the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world.

&c. Even the Corinthians receive a more kindly salutation. They had not "erred concerning the faith" as had these Galatians.

The word 'Church' in the N.T. is used either (1) of the whole body of believers, "the whole congregation of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world" (Canon lv.), (Matt. xvi. 18; Col. i. 24), or (2) of a particular congregation, under the same ministry of the word and sacraments. Thus we read of the Church in Cenchrea (1 Cor. xvi. 1), of the Churches of Asia (1 Cor. xvi. 19; Rev. i. 4, &c.), of the Church in a particular house (Col. iv. 15; Philem. 2). (3) It is also used of an assembly of believers gathered together for worship, as 1 Cor. xiv. 28. The Churches of the Thessalonians and Laodiceans are exceptions to the usual form, in which the precise locality is designated. We may assume that the Churches of Galatia were bodies of converts living in the principal cities, Ancyra, Pessinus, &c. See Introduction, p. ix.

3. Grace be to you...Christ] "These two words, grace and peace, comprehend in them whatsoever belongeth to Christianity. Grace releaseth sin, and peace maketh the conscience quiet," Luther. We have here another indirect, but clear proof of the Godhead of our Lord Jesus Christ. He is with the Eternal Father the source and giver of grace and peace, and therefore He is "the God of all grace" (1 Pet. v. 10), and "the God of Peace" (Heb. xiii. 10).

A similar form of salutation occurs 1 Thess. i. 1, and elsewhere.

4. who gave himself...our Father] The Apostle here prepares the way for the discussion of his great subject. He cannot think of the Gospel—pardon, justification, acceptance with God, and eternal life—apart from the atoning death of Christ. The efficacy of that "precious death" depends on the voluntary surrender of Himself by our Blessed Lord, "to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men." (Article II.)

who gave himself] The Father gave the Son. The Son gave Himself.

for our sins] not merely to denounce sin—Moses and the prophets had done this; not merely to set us a perfect example—this would have been to mock the misery of unpardoned, unsanctified men and women. His death was for our sins. The exact force of the preposition may fall short of asserting the vicarious nature of our Lord's sacrifice—indeed the reading of the Original is not free from doubt. But the Apostle's language is in entire accord with his teaching elsewhere, and must be so explained. (Comp. Rom. iii. 25; 2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iii. 13; 1 Tim. ii. 6.)

that he might deliver us] Rescue us from the thraldom of, &c. The same word is used of the deliverance of Joseph (Acts vii. 10) and by our Lord Himself in reference to St Paul (Acts xxvi. 17). Freedom as the result of emancipation is the great blessing of the Gospel. See v. 1, 13, and comp. John viii. 32—36. It is also "the keynote of this Epistle".

from this present evil world] World, lit. age. The Greek word 5 evil world, according to the will of God and our Father: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

6 I marvel that you are so soon removed from him that signifies, the present state of things, the world's life, regarded in its transitory nature, as a condition of existence, rather than the material creation. Matter is not essentially evil. It becomes an instrument of evil by reason of man's transgression of the law of God. There is a similar usage in the familiar expression of the Roman historian 'Corruptere et corrumpi seculum vocatur,' Tac. Germ. 17; compare 'secunda culpa secula,' of Horace. Two other renderings of the phrase are admissible; (1) from the present (or besetting) evil of the world; or (2) from the evil of the present world. Our Lord prayed for His disciples, not that they should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evil; and He has taught us to pray, 'Deliver us from the evil.' There is however a true sense in which Christians are delivered, rescued from this present evil age or dispensation, from its power and its contamination—a dispensation so often contrasted with "that world" (Luke xx. 35) into which sin and defilement cannot enter. Satan, who is the god of this present evil world, will then be finally vanquished and "tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. xx. 10).

according to the will of God and our Father] Better, of God our Father. That 'will' is the ultimate cause and law. Redemption is its fulfilment. Hence our Lord declares that He came to do the will of Him that sent Him. John iv. 34, v. 30, and espec. vi. 38—40; comp. Heb. x. 7—10, "By which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." The will of the Father and the will of the Son are distinct, but in perfect harmony.

The will is Divine, and therefore claims our submission. It is our Father's will, and therefore appeals to our filial love and confidence. This thought inspires the ascription,

5. to whom be glory...Amen] perh. 'the glory'. All the glory of the great work of Redemption, in its design, in its process, in its results, is His alone and shall be throughout eternity.

Amen] A Hebrew word, signifying 'truth,' used to express concurrence in the prayer or praise uttered by another, especially in public worship. Deut. xxvii. 15; 1 Chron. xvi. 36. From the synagogue it passed into the acts of worship of the Christian Church (1 Cor. xiv. 16). Here it is employed as an emphatic affirmation of the ascription to which it is appended. Comp. Psalm, lxxii. 19; Rev. i. 18, xxii. 20.

6—10. THE SUBJECT AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE.

6. I marvel...gospel] The contrast between the form of address here adopted and that of other letters of St Paul is (as already noted) remarkable. In writing to the Philippians, Colossians and Thessalonians, his opening words are expressive of thankfulness for the constancy of their faith and the fervour of their love. Even for the Corinthians, notwithstanding the party spirit which prevailed among them and the called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or grievous sin which called for sharp rebuke, he has words of affection and even thankfulness. But the case of the Galatians was different. They had departed from the faith. Their error was fundamental, and if persisted in, fatal.

so soon removed] rather, so quickly passing over, transferring your allegiance.

'So quickly' is generally explained as, so soon after your conversion, or, after my recent visit. Commentators see an illustration of this expression in the frickleness of the national character, mentioned by Caesar and Tacitus, and the intellectual restlessness noticed by Themistius, a writer of the 4th century A.D. But perhaps it only means 'so readily', with so little compunction, or resistance to the false teachers. Comp. 2 Thess. ii. 2.

from him that called you...Christ] Luther renders, "From Christ who called you in grace." If the word Christ (omitted by some authorities) is to be retained, this is the best rendering of the passage for the reasons which he assigns. "It liketh me, that even as Paul a little before made Christ the Redeemer, who by His death delivereth us from this present evil world; also the giver of grace and peace equally with God the Father; so he should here make Him equally the caller in grace; for Paul's special purpose is to beat into our minds the benefit of Christ, by whom we come unto the Father."

Our calling is in grace, i.e. in His free and unmerited favour and goodness; as opposed to all notion of salvation by moral or ceremonial righteousness. "If it be by grace, then it is no more of works, otherwise grace ceases to be grace any longer." Rom. xi. 6.

unto another gospel] rather, 'a different' or 'strange gospel', a perverted gospel. I do not call it 'another gospel', for that would be to admit that there could be more than one.

This strange gospel appealed for authority to the other Apostles rather than to St Paul; and it insisted on the observance of the Jewish ceremonial law as a condition of salvation, ch. iv. 10, 11, &c.

7. but there be some that trouble...Christ] Only so far can it be called another gospel, as it is a perversion of the Gospel of Christ. It does not profess to be a distinct revelation; it claims to be 'the Gospel', Just as we might speak of spurious coin, though it was not issued from the mint.

some that trouble you] The Judaizing teachers (ch. v. 10) who were drawing them away from their allegiance, and raising factions among them.

and would pervert] 'Would' is not a mere auxiliary. Their desire and determination are to 'reverse, to change to the opposite, and so stronger than to pervert or distort' (Lightfoot). St Paul regarded the new doctrine as subversive of the truth and utterly incompatible with the Gospel which he preached.

the gospel of Christ] Christ is at once its Author, its theme, its sub-an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man stance. Elsewhere it is termed the "Gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1), and the "Gospel of His Son" (Rom. i. 9).
8. You have listened to these false teachers. But the Gospel is one and unchangeable, admitting of no addition or modification. Even though I, Paul, and those who, as Timothy, Titus and Silas, are like minded with me—nay, even though an Angel from heaven should preach anything as supplementary to that which I have preached, let him be accursed.

any other gospel] It is impossible to translate this verse literally.
The passage implies the perfection of the Gospel which Paul had preached. To add to it was to impugn this perfection. "If any man preach to you as Gospel anything besides that which we have preached." Romanist writers contend for the rendering 'against'. But in this case "besides" is 'against'.

accursed] lit. anathema, cut off, not from the Communion of the Church (which could not apply to an angel), but from the favour of God.
It is instructive to notice that the Council of Trent pronounces anathema against those who do not regard the Apocryphal books as sacred and Canonical Scripture, or who knowingly and deliberately despise the unwritten traditions of the Church. Conc. Trid. Sess. IV.
The word 'anathema', rendered by 'accursed' in the A.V. is the Septuagint equivalent of the Hebrew דָּאָרְמָא (Deut. vii. 26; Josh. vi. 17, 18, &c.), and is used to denote a person or thing devoted to destruction, because accursed of God. The exact expression occurs in only one other passage of the N.T., 1 Cor. xvi. 22, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema." How are we to understand these strong expressions? Surely St Paul is not imprecating a curse on every man (or angel) who should propagate false doctrine, and on every professing Christian who does not love the Lord Jesus.
He would have prayed for such an one, and have bidden his converts pray that God would "bring into the way of truth all such as have erred and are deceived". His meaning is, "Let such an one be regarded by you as under wrath and curse of Almighty God." Solemn words, so understood, and full of warning. This view of their force may be illustrated by our Lord's language, "Let him be unto thee as a heathen and a publican," Matt. xviii. 17.

9. He repeats his denunciation with slight differences. (1) He does not mention 'an angel from heaven', (2) what in the preceding verse he put hypothetically, "should any...preach", is now assumed to be the fact, "if any is preaching"; (3) there, it was a Gospel which St Paul had preached to them, here, it is a Gospel which they had 'received'. This reception of the truth made its relinquishment more perilous.

As we said before] lit. as we have said before. The reference is not to v. 8, but to the teaching of St Paul and his colleagues on the preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed. For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of occasion of his second visit to them. They had drifted away from their old position: St Paul’s position is ‘now’ the same as ‘before’.

10. For do I now persuade men, or God? The particle ‘for’ connects this verse with what precedes. ‘I speak thus decisively and strongly, for in the first place my motives are pure and cannot be impugned; and secondly (vv. 11 foll.) the truths which I deliver are a revelation from God.’

now] ‘at this stage of my ministry.’ He could not be charged with a desire for popularity, which leads men to sinful concessions. He may be indirectly referring to the case of Peter, which is fully narrated, ch. ii. 11, &c.

persuade men, or God] The one word ‘persuade’, which cannot properly be applied to God, is used with both nouns by the grammatical figure Zeugma. “Can it be said of me now, that I am courting the favour of men, or am I seeking the favour of God?” The word rendered ‘persuade’ is translated “made...their friend”, Acts xii. 20. For the more common use of the verb, comp. 2 Cor. v. 11, “we persuade men.”

if I yet...of Christ] If I any longer acted as men act by nature, before conversion to God. The ‘men-pleaser’ (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iii. 22) stands in strong contrast to the ‘servant’, the bondservant of Christ. “No man can serve (be a slave to) two masters,” Matt. vi. 24. The ‘slave’ not only does the will of his master, he belongs to his master.

11—24. THE DIVINE COMMISSION AND APOSTOLICAL AUTHORITY OF ST PAUL.

11. But I certify] Now I declare to you. The same verb is used in 1 Cor. xv. 1 to introduce an emphatic statement.

not after man] i.e. not in accordance with human notions or conceptions, and therefore not such as could have been evolved out of human consciousness. It was communicated to St Paul by direct revelation from God.

12. For I neither received it of man] ‘I’ is emphatic: I received not the Gospel, any more than did the other Apostles, from man.

neither was I taught it] St Paul might have received the Gospel from God, and yet have been more fully instructed by men. This was not the case, comp. ch. ii. 6. He both received and was taught it by direct revelation. The commission to Ananias (Acts ix. 10, &c.) is not at variance with this declaration. It does not appear that he made any communication of religious knowledge to St Paul (vv. 18, 19).
13 Jesus Christ. For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it: and profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of by the revelation of Jesus Christ] Rather, through the revelation. 'Jesus Christ' may be either the subject or the object, the Revealer or the Revealed; but probably the latter is primarily intended, see v. 16. Different opinions are held as to the time when this revelation was made. Certainly it took place at the time of his conversion, and probably on other subsequent occasions. In 2 Cor. xii. 7 he speaks of 'the abundance of the revelations' which he had received; comp. 2 Cor. xii. 7.

13. Nothing short of a miracle could account for the change which had taken place in the life and aims of St Paul (comp. Phil. iii. 4—10). It was not likely that a man with such antecedents should have accepted the Gospel with its consequences on merely human testimony.

ye have heard] Rather, Ye heard from myself when I was with you, and (perhaps) from my colleagues.

my conversation] i.e. my manner of life, as Eph. iv. 22; Heb. xiii. 7; James iii. 13, &c. In Phil. i. 27, iii. 20 the same English word represents a different word in the original, and refers to civil and political duties and privileges, rather than those which are personal and social.

the Jews' religion] One word in the original, which does not occur elsewhere in the N.T. except in v. 14. From the use of the corresponding verb, we may regard it as referring not to the religion revealed to the Jews in the writings of Moses and the prophets, but that which was its actual development in St Paul's day, when the word of God had been overlaid and 'made of none effect' by the traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees, and the puerile conceits of the Rabbinic expositors.

I persecuted the church of God] The same sad confession is made 1 Cor. xv. 9. There is solemnity in the addition of the words "of God". The identical expression occurs in the Sept. version of Nehem. xiii. 1.

wasted it] was laying waste, was sweeping it away, exterminating it.

14. St Paul was always in earnest. In the acquisition of Rabbinic lore he outstripped most of those of his own age, not merely his fellow-disciples at Tarsus, and in the school of Gamaliel at Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 3), but in his own nation generally.

zealous] Lit. a zealot (Acts xxii. 20). St Paul by birth and by early education was associated with the extreme party of the Pharisees, who were marked by their bigoted adherence to the traditional interpretations of the Old Testament, as distinct from the written text.

traditions of my fathers] By 'traditions' we must understand religious teaching and precept handed down orally from father to son, whether ultimately committed to writing or not. The word occurs twelve times my fathers. But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood:

in the N.T. and is always used in the Gospels in a disparaging sense. Compare for example Matt. xv. 6, 9; Mark vii. 9; so Col. ii. 8.

In 1 Cor. xi. 2 (where it is rendered 'ordinances') and in 2 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 6, it refers to oral directions given by St Paul, of which some (as that contained in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2) were temporary and special, others subsequently embodied in writing.

Here St Paul is referring to the traditions which were held and transmitted by the 'most straitest sect' of the Jewish religion (Acts xxvi. 5). Similarly St Peter, addressing the Jews of the dispersion, who had embraced Christianity, reminds them that they had been redeemed from their vain manner of life, handed down by tradition from their fathers (1 Pet. i. 18).

15, 16. But a wordrous change was effected in me. 'Old things had passed away. Behold, they had become new.' The source of this change was the purpose of God; the means, His effectual calling: the end, that St Paul night preach Christ to the Gentiles.

15. it pleased God] The commentary of Theodore of Mopsuestia on this expression is apt. "St Paul well refers it to the Divine foreknowledge, so that before he himself had any being, this should appear the good pleasure of God concerning him; and that so his preaching might be regarded as far enough removed from novelty or human invention." In personal religion no less than in doctrinal theology we must humbly recognise this good pleasure of God as the source of every blessing which the Gospel conveys to us.

16. to reveal his Son in me] Christ had been revealed to St Paul when He was seen by him in the flesh (1 Cor. ix. 1). But a more blessed revelation was vouchsafed, when Christ was revealed within him. Then the Light of the World lighted up the recesses of his soul, or in his own words, "God who said the light shall shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The construction is, "when it pleased God...to reveal &c." the words "who separated...His grace" being parenthetical.

the heathen] Rather, the Gentiles, as including the other; and as in more marked contrast to the Jews.

neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me: but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem Damascus who were already 'disciples of the Lord!' (Acts ix. 1).

Instead however of thus conferring with flesh and blood, or going to Jerusalem to consult the Apostles in that city, he went into Arabia. with flesh and blood i.e. with man, weak and fallible. A Hebraism. Matt. xvi. 17; Eph. vi. 12; Heb. ii. 14.

17. neither went I up to Jerusalem] The situation of Jerusalem was on a hill, and it was also the Jewish metropolis, the political centre formerly, and still the religious centre of the nation. “Thither the tribes went up, the tribes of Jehovah,” Ps. cxxii. 4. We speak of ‘going up’ to London.

to them which were apostles before me] He admits the fact of their priority in point of time, while repudiating the inference that they had any claim to greater authority than himself. In like manner the antiquity of the Roman Church is no argument for Papal supremacy, much less for Papal infallibility. For the thought, we may compare Rom. xvi. 7, “My fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the Apostles, who also have been in Christ before me.”

into Arabia...Damascus] “A thick veil”, says Bp Lightfoot, “hangs over St Paul’s visit to Arabia.” It is not mentioned in the narrative in the Acts. The locality, the object, and the time of this visit are alike uncertain. A full discussion of them must be reserved for an Appendix (I. p. 83). In the interval between his conversion A.D. 37 and his visit to Jerusalem A.D. 40, St Paul would seem to have sought retirement in the desert of Sinai, and there by prayer and meditation and undistracted communion with God, to have equipped himself for the warfare which only terminated with his life. How much of the three years was thus spent, we are not told. At its expiration St Paul returned to Damascus, and when at length the Jews conspired to take away his life, he made his escape and fled to Jerusalem (Acts ix. 23—26). He refers to this incident, 2 Cor. xi. 32.

Damascus] One of the oldest cities in the world, first mentioned in the history of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15, xv. 2). It was conquered by David (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6), but subsequently recovered by the Syrians. After various vicissitudes it succumbed to the Assyrian arms. The city was destroyed, and the people carried away captives to Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 9). It subsequently fell under the Macedonian and the Roman power, and in the time of St Paul it was included in the territory of Aretas, an Arabian prince (2 Cor. xi. 32) who was father-in-law of Herod Antipas, and who held his kingdom under the Romans. It is pleasantly situated at the foot of the Anti-Libanus range of mountains, distant 133 miles north of Jerusalem and 60 miles from the Mediterranean Sea, in a fertile district watered by the historic streams, Abana and Pharpar.

18. It was not till three years after his conversion that St Paul went up to Jerusalem to visit St Peter. to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord’s brother.

to see] to become personally acquainted with. The word in the original is used of those who visit great and famous cities. He was introduced to the Apostles by Barnabas (Acts ix. 27).

Peter] The more probable reading is ‘Cephas’, the Aramaic equivalent of the Greek ‘Petros’, the name given by our Lord to Simon Bar-Jona (John i. 43; Matt. xvi. 18).

fifteen days] St Paul does not disguise the fact that he spent a fortnight in the society, perhaps as the guest of Peter. But, as Bengel observes, it was hardly long enough for him to have been made an apostle by Cephas. Part too (perhaps a great part) of the time was spent in disputation with the Grecian Jews. The visit was terminated by their conspiring to take his life (Acts ix. 29, 30), and by a command of the Lord in a vision to go unto the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 17—21).

19. “Other of the apostles I saw not, but James, the brother of the Lord.” The A.V. would lead to the conclusion that James was one of the Apostles, in the same sense as Peter was an Apostle, i.e. one of the Twelve. But it is almost certain that ‘save’ is an incorrect rendering, as in Luke iv. 26, 27 (where indeed it makes nonsense of the passage). See note on ch. ii. 16. St James may still have been spoken of as an Apostle in the wider sense, in which it is now generally admitted the term is used in N.T.

James, the Lord’s brother] How are we to identify this James? And what are we to understand by the designation ‘the Lord’s brother’?

(1) Two of the Twelve bore the name of James; one, the son of Zebedee and brother of John, the other the son of Alphæus (or Cleopas). It is agreed on all hands that the former is not the James here spoken of. It is also highly improbable that he is identical with the son of Alpheus, called ‘James the less’ (literally ‘the Little’) in Mark xv. 40. If St Paul had conferred with two of the number of the Twelve, his characteristic candour would have led him to state the fact distinctly. He admits that James was one of the Apostolic body, but he was not, like Cephas, one of the original Twelve. We therefore conclude that this James was the president of the Church at Jerusalem (see Acts xv. 13, xxii. 18) and distinct both from the son of Zebedee, who fell by the sword of Herod (Acts xii. 2), and from the son of Alphæus. In the Book of Common Prayer ‘St James the Apostle’ is identified with the ‘brother of John’, and the other St James (coupled with St Philip) with the author of the Epistle, and brother of Jude.

(2) It would seem that whatever we understand by the ‘Lord’s brethren’, they were not of the number of the Twelve. For we are expressly told that towards the close of our Lord’s earthly ministry, His brethren did not believe on Him (John vii. 5).

Three views of the relationship here expressed have been held by expositors of Scripture. (a) Some contend that the expression ‘brethren’
Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not. Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; and was unknown by face unto the churches of is to be understood literally of sons of the Virgin Mary and Joseph, born after the birth of our Lord. This opinion is maintained by Arch-deacon Farrar in Dict. of the Bible, Art. "Brother"; but it is rejected by all who with the chief Patristic writers insist on the perpetual virginity of Mary. (b) Others regard these "brethren" as cousins of our Lord, the sons of Mary (sister of the Virgin) and Cleopas. This may be dismissed for the reason stated already—that one of them was of the number of the Twelve, and therefore could not be described as not believing on Him. (c) A third hypothesis is that they were sons of Joseph by a former marriage, and therefore half-brothers of our Lord. (That they were the offspring of a Levirate marriage of Joseph with Mary wife of Cleopas, after the death of the latter, may be mentioned as an instance of groundless assumption, only to be discarded.)

The choice then lies between the first and the third view. In a case where the arguments are almost evenly balanced, it is not easy to decide, but on the whole they seem to favour the conclusion that the "brethren" were sons of Joseph by a former marriage, and therefore 'half-brothers' or step-brothers of our Lord. In support of this conclusion we note that if Joseph is called the father of our Lord (Luke ii. 48), Joseph's sons may without great violence be called His brethren. For a full discussion of the subject, see Dict. of the Bible, ut supra, Bp Lightfoot, Dissertation II, Alford on Matt. xiii. 56.

The other Apostles were probably absent from Jerusalem at this time, on a missionary tour, visiting and confirming the Churches of Judæa and Galilee and Samaria.

20. Considering that the vital question of St Paul's credentials was at stake, we need not wonder at this solemn asseveration and appeal to the judgment of God.

21. In the Acts we are told that when the brethren knew of the plot against St Paul's life, they "brought him down to Cæsarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus". This is in agreement with the statement of the text. Cæsarea was the port from which in all probability St Paul sailed to Tarsus, the capital of Cilicia. The expression "the regions of Syria and Cilicia" must not be pressed as describing the order in which he visited the two countries. We learn from Acts xi. 25—30 that Barnabas went to Tarsus, and, having found Saul, brought him to Antioch, the capital of Syria, where he continued teaching for a whole year.

22. and was unknown] rather, and I continued unknown. So far from his having learned the truths which he taught from the other Apostles, the Churches of Judæa, to which they principally ministered at this time, did not know him even by sight. It is not certain whether the Church of Jerusalem is included among these. Bengel says, "outside Jerusalem." But it is quite possible that during the fortnight spent Judea which were in Christ: but they had heard only, That he which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. And they glorified God in which were in Christ] The word Church (=eclesia, an assembly, Acts xix. 32, 39, 41) had not yet acquired the exclusively restricted sense of a Christian congregation. The Church of God (with its component churches or congregations) had existed in the patriarchal age and in subsequent times (even in the dark days when "they that feared the Lord spake often one to another"), until the coming of Christ. But they were not 'in Christ', until they had believed in and confessed the faith of Christ crucified.

23, 24. They only heard reports to the effect that, Our former persecutor is now preaching the faith which he once was seeking to destroy.

23. the faith] Three principal senses attach to this word in the N.T.:

(1) Truth, or truthfulness, trustworthiness; e.g. Rom. iii. 3, "the faith of God."

(2) Belief of, or confidence in a Person or thing. This is its most common meaning.

(3) The revelation of the character, will and purpose of God 'who cannot lie'—the only thing certain and permanent in a mutable and transitory world, and therefore worthy of hearty belief and implicit confidence. So here, the Gospel of Christ as taught and accepted by believers.

24. The conduct of the Judæan Christians is noteworthy, not only as in marked contrast with that of the Judaizing party in Galatia, but as testifying to the soundness of the Apostle's teaching. The Gospel which he preached, though independent of them as to its source, was identical with that which they had themselves welcomed. And they ascribed the glory to God in the grace given to His servant.

This is a sure test of the reality of our faith and love:—when we read or hear of men being raised up to "preach the faith" in days that are past, or in distant lands (as, for example, in the great missionary work of the Church), do we glorify God in them? This was well understood by the English Reformers.

In the Commemoration Service (dating from the time of Q. Elizabeth, and not improbably drawn up by Abp Parker) which is used in the University, and some, if not all of the Colleges of Cambridge, there is a prayer commencing, 'O Lord, we glorify Thee in these Thy servants our Benefactors departed out of this present life.' No better commentary on the expression can be found than the Collect for the Conversion of St Paul. Compare also our Lord's words, "All mine (neut. but including masc. and fem.) are thine, and thine are mine; and I am glorified in them."
Then fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that

CHAPTER II.

1—10. ST PAUL'S VISIT TO JERUSALEM.

11—21. VISIT TO ANTIOCH AND DISAGREEMENT WITH ST. PETER.

This chapter consists of two paragraphs. We have, first, an account of a visit of St Paul to Jerusalem, and his conference with the Apostles of the Circumcision (vv. 1—10); and, secondly, a narrative of his disagreement with Peter at Antioch and a conclusion upon the question in debate (vv. 11—21).

1. fourteen years after] This is not to be reckoned from the time of the first visit, mentioned ch. i. 18, but from the date of St Paul's conversion; and this visit may therefore be assigned to A.D. 51. It was on the occasion described in Acts xv.

St Paul had gone to Jerusalem once during the interval, to carry relief to the poor brethren who were suffering from the famine, Acts xi. 30, xii. 25. But he does not here refer to that visit, because its object and attendant circumstances are foreign to the purpose of his present argument, and because he had probably no opportunity then of conferring with the Apostles. The visit was purely one of benevolence, and may have been brief in duration. Calvin, however, and others identify the visit of this verse with that of Acts xi. 30. Twice after this, St Paul revisited the Holy City—in A.D. 54, of which visit a cursory mention is made Acts xviii. 21, 22, and finally in A.D. 58 (Acts xxii. 17).

with Barnabas] This name, which signifies 'the Son of Exhortation', was given by the Apostles to an early convert, whose original name was Joseph or Joses. He was a Levite of Cyprus, and was associated with Paul in the commencement of his missionary work among the Gentiles. He accompanied him on this occasion, as well as on the previous visit to Jerusalem, recorded in Acts xi. 30. Like St Paul, though not of the number of the Twelve, he was included in "the glorious company of the Apostles" (see Lightfoot, p. 93).

At the conclusion of this visit, owing to a dispute with St Paul, Barnabas separated from him, and is not again mentioned in St Luke's narrative.

Titus also] He was one among the 'certain others' appointed by the Church in Antioch to go up to Jerusalem with Paul and Barnabas (Acts xv. 2). He is specially mentioned because of the incident narrated in v. 2 foll.

2. by revelation] In the Acts no mention is made of this divine intimation. It would seem to have been concurrent with the external gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain. But neither Titus, who was with me in commission from the Church. The account of this visit is not contradictory to, or even inconsistent with St Luke's narrative in Acts xv. They supplement one another. "The account of the Acts is fuller; that of the Galatians only brings out the chief points. Luke, in keeping with the documentary character of the Acts, gives us the public transactions of the Council at Jerusalem; Paul taking a knowledge of these for granted, shortly alludes to his private conference and agreement with the Apostles. Both together give us a complete history of that remarkable convention." Schaff.

1 His festival is retained in the Calendar of the English Church, with special Collect, Epistle, and Gospel. In the Collect he is termed 'thy holy Apostle Barnabas'. Under June 11, to the bare name Barnabas in the Calendar was prefixed in 1662 'S.', and added, 'Apost. and M.'

The phrase 'by revelation' is used by St Paul (Eph. iii. 3) of the means by which the will and purpose of God in the Gospel were communicated to him. How this revelation is effected we know not. It consists in the temporary uplifting of the veil which hides "the things not seen", and always implies the sure conviction of its reality and Divine origin on the part of the recipient. Comp. i. 12.

communicated] not as a would-be disciple, but as one on a footing of equality.

to them] i.e. the Church at Jerusalem.

that Gospel which I preach] St Paul was still preaching the same Gospel among the Gentiles. It was the same in principle and substance, however varying in its application to the diverse characters and circumstances of those to whom it came.

privately] Privately, not secretly. There is here no hint of any suppression of the truth. The object of this private consultation was to prepare for the public conference, and was alike an act of respectful courtesy towards the officers of the Church, and a wise precaution to ensure orderly proceedings at the Council.

to them which were of reputation] Better, 'to those of high reputation', the leaders, pillars of the Church. The same expression occurs with slight additions vv. 6, 9.

lest...in vain] It was very important that there should be unanimity at the Council. If at the first synod of the Church, it should appear that St Paul was preaching a different Gospel among the Gentiles from that which was taught by the Apostles in Judæa, the result could not fail to be distrust of the former (so prone are men to test truth by the numbers and position of its advocates), and thus the success of his labours would be impaired.

Most commentators suppose the Apostle to fear lest his work for the future should be hindered, and that in the past undone. The construction of the original is peculiar and difficult. The particle rendered 'or', may mean 'than' or 'more than'. And so the sense would be, 'Lest I should run less successfully than hitherto'. The metaphor of a 'race' as descriptive of a course of life or of labour is a familiar one with St Paul. Acts xx. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7.

3—5. The construction of this passage is irregular and uncertain, me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised: and that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: to and the meaning of several words and phrases obscure. But the general argument would seem to be as follows:—'I conferred indeed with the Apostles at Jerusalem, but though I was quite ready to treat them with courtesy and respect, I was not prepared to make to them any concession of principle. That would have been to allow their authority as superior to my own, and would also have been a betrayal of the Gospel. An attempt was made to assert the necessity of obedience to the ceremonial law, as a condition of justification. This attempt took a practical shape, when certain false brethren with sinister motives demanded that Titus, a Gentile, should submit to circumcision. The Apostles were for temporising, in the hope of conciliating these intruders, who were really spies, feigning themselves to be true men and zealous for the law. The question in itself might seem indifferent. [St Paul had himself taken Timothy 'and circumcised him on account of the Jews', Acts xvi. 3. But then Timothy was the son of a Jewish mother.] But when they tried compulsion, I at once made a stand and refused compliance. What I might perhaps have conceded to love, was resisted when it involved subjection to these false brethren: that the Gospel in its purity and fulness might be preserved for you Gentiles. Of that Gospel the observance of the ceremonial law is no condition. To insist upon it, is to pervert the truth of the Gospel, and send men back for salvation to the "weak and beggarly elements" from which Christ by His death hath for ever set us free'.

3. neither Titus] Better, not even Titus, who, as Paul's colleague, might have thus had more ready access to the Jews.

was compelled] Scholefield renders, "was under any necessity to be circumcised, but only because, &c." i.e. there was no necessity for his being circumcised, except that pretended necessity which was set up by these false brethren. (Hints for an improved Translation of the N. T.)

"Paul might have suffered Titus to be circumcised; but because he saw they would compel him thereunto, he would not. For if they had prevailed therein, by-and-by they would have gathered that it had been necessary to justification, and so through this sufferance would have triumphed against Paul." Luther.

4. and that, because] Better, but only, because. The pressure would not have been put upon us, had it not been for false brethren, &c.

false brethren] Rather, 'pretended'. Venn.

unawares brought in] Rather, 'insidiously brought in'.

our freedom] Liberty (not license) is the watchword of the Gospel. The truth alone—the truth as it is in Jesus makes man free—free alike from the bondage of the law and the slavery of sin.

bring us into bondage] A strong expression—'utterly enslave us'. For whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you. But of these who seemed to be somewhat, (whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man’s person:) for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me: but contrariwise, when they saw that the thought, ever uppermost in St Paul’s mind when writing this Epistle, comp. ch. iv. 21—v. 1.

5. To whom...an hour] In some early copies the negative seems to have been omitted. “We yielded by a temporary concession”. This would of course imply that Titus was circumcised. But the received reading is not to be disturbed.

the truth of the Gospel] The truth which is indeed good tidings—that man is justified for the merit’s sake of Jesus Christ by faith, and not for his own works or deservings.

with you] Galatians, and with all other Gentile converts.

6—9. The construction is again broken and irregular. The punctuation of the Rev. Vers. makes the sense clear. “But from those who were reputed to be somewhat (whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth not man’s person)—they, I say, who were of repute imparted nothing to me: but contrariwise, when they saw that I had been intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter with the gospel of the circumcision (for He that wrought for Peter unto the apostleship of the circumcision wrought for me also unto the Gentiles); and when they perceived the grace that was given unto me, James and Cephas and John, they who were reputed to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we should go unto the Gentiles, and they unto the circumcision”.

6. But of these] Rather, “But from those”. The sentence would have run regularly—“From those of reputation...I gained no new enlightenment”, but having been interrupted by a parenthesis (whatsoever...person) the structure is changed. “To me, I say, these eminent persons gave no new instruction”.

who seemed to be somewhat] nearly as in v. 2. ‘Those of considerable reputation’, though here perhaps not without a shade of irony.

whatsoever they were] Rather, ‘once were’, i.e. as the chosen companions of Christ during His earthly ministry.

God accepteth no man’s person] The force of this Hebraism is well illustrated by its use, Acts x. 34. “God does not confine His favours to those upon whom He has already bestowed them, however abundantly”.

for they who seemed] ‘for’ is here merely resumptive:—‘to me, I say, those of reputation (is there not a tinge of irony in the repetition of the phrase?) imparted nothing new’.

7—9. ‘So far from their communicating any further revelation to me, their conduct was the very opposite of this. They recognised the
the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter; (for he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me towards the Gentiles;) and when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they completeness of the Gospel which I preach, by consenting to the arrangement by which I was to go to the Gentiles and they to the Jews.

Two causes combined to bring about this result—they 'saw' the success of St Paul's missionary labours, 'the signs and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles' by Paul and Barnabas (Acts xv. 12); and they recognised the cause of this success, the grace of God, which alone can make a weak and sinful man to be an able minister of the new covenant.

7. contrariwise] See 2 Cor. ii. 6, 7; 1 Peter iii. 9. In both these passages the word expresses the strongest possible contrast. It is used absolutely, 'The very reverse was the case—when they saw, &c.'

when they saw] 'They' is used with reference to 'those of reputation', before mentioned, and is restricted (v. 9) to three Apostles specified by name.

_the gospel of the uncircumcision...to Peter] Clearly not two different Gospels, as Jowett understands the passage. This would be to contradict what had been said ch. i. 6—9. It can only mean 'the work of evangelising Gentiles and Jews'. So we read of 'the beginning of the Gospel' Phil. iv. 15, i.e. the early days of missionary effort. In the Greek the word 'Gospel' is not repeated, but has been supplied (in Italics) in both A.V. and R.V. A more exact rendering would be, "I have been entrusted with the Gospel for the Gentiles, even as Peter was for the Jews". The disease is one and the same, however the symptoms may vary in different individuals or classes, Rom. iii. 9; Is. liii. 6, and the remedy is one, Rom. i. 16, iii. 28—30.

was committed] Lit. 'has been entrusted', comp. 1 Thess. ii. 4; 1 Cor. iv. 1.

8. This verse is parenthetical. It expands and explains verse 7.

in Peter] Rather, 'for Peter'—so 'for me'.

9. In the Greek the order is, 'And when they perceived the grace that had been given to me, James and Cephas and John &c.' James (see note i. 19) is named first, because the reference is to a special act of the Church in Jerusalem, of which he was president or Bishop. "When St Paul is speaking of the missionary office of the Church at large, St Peter holds the foremost place". Lightfoot. Compare vv. 7, 8 with Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18.

seemed to be pillars] Better, 'were in repute as pillars'. The metaphor by which the Church is compared to a house or temple is frequent both in the O. T. and N. T. See 2 Cor. vi. 16, and Rev. iii. 12, 'I will make him a pillar in the sanctuary of my God'. gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision. Only they would that we should remember the poor; so the same which I also was forward to do.

the right hands of fellowship] as a pledge of fidelity to the same truth, with a view to the adoption of distinct spheres of missionary labour.

10. One reservation was made which was in accordance with my own earnest desire.

the poor] In the department of almsgiving no distinction was to be made. On two recorded occasions, St Paul conveyed alms from the Gentiles to the poor saints in Jerusalem, Acts x. 29, 30; 1 Cor. xvi. 3. He was not afraid of being charged with resorting to bribery for gaining converts—a justification, if any be needed, of the action of Missionary Societies in modern times. Our Lord Himself had set the example.

11—22. We learn from Acts xv. 22, foll. that when the Council broke up, certain members of the Apostolic company were sent to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas, to convey to the Churches of Syria and Cilicia the determination of the Church in Jerusalem on the question which had been submitted to them, as to the necessity of circumcision in the case of Gentile converts. After the deputation had returned to Jerusalem, Paul and Barnabas "tarried in Antioch". It was during their stay that the visit of St Peter took place, as to which St Luke is silent.

Various attempts were made in early times to explain away an incident, which seemed to throw discredit on Peter or Paul or on both of them. To some it appeared incredible that Peter, the Apostle of the circumcision, should have been permitted to fall into grievous doctrinal error; to others, that St Paul should have treated him with such severity; to a third class, that such a dispute should have arisen in the infancy of the Church between its two principal teachers, both being inspired men. But we may note, 1st, that the error of St Peter did not consist in preaching false doctrine, but in a want of straightforwardness of conduct, by which the truth of the Gospel was liable to be perverted.

2nd, that moral perfection is not to be looked for, even in an Apostle.

3rd, that St Peter's conduct, as here described, is quite consistent with that portrayed by the Evangelists. "Boldness and timidity, first boldness, then timidity, were the characteristics of his nature.

"It is remarkable, and may be considered as a proof of the truth of the history, that this conduct, however unintelligible, is in keeping with Peter's character. We recognise in it the lineaments of him who confessed Christ first, and first denied Him; who began by refusing that Christ should wash his feet, and then said, 'not my feet only, but my hands and my head'; who cut off the ear of the servant of the high-priest, when they came to take Jesus, and then forsook Him and fled". Jowett.

4th, that St Paul's rebuke, though unsparing, is free from any rudeness of expression or personal animosity.

5th, that the record of this painful interview, while placing St Paul's Apostolic authority in the strongest light, and therefore germane to his purpose in the opening chapters of this Epistle, is a precious heritage of the Church—an everlasting monument of the grace of God. For an admirable summary of the instructive lessons which it contains, see Dr Schaff's Commentary, p. 29. Appendix II. p. 84. That the two great Apostles were at heart agreed, taught and influenced by the same Spirit, and zealous for the same truth, is shewn by the touching allusion made subsequently by Peter (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16) to the Epistles (including this to the Galatians) of 'our beloved brother Paul'—an allusion the more striking because the letter in which it occurs is probably addressed to Galatian converts among others.

11. Peter] In the Greek, 'Cephas', the Apostle Peter. The difficulty of accepting this narrative in its obvious sense, led some in early times to suggest that not the Apostle, but one of the seventy disciples of the same name, is here referred to.

withstood him to the face] Jerome's well-known solution of the difficulty—a solution which approved itself to Chrysostom—that the reproof was only apparent, was refuted by Augustine and ultimately abandoned by Jerome. It supposes a preconcerted plan for convincing, not Peter, but the Jewish converts, that the obligation of the ceremonial law had ceased, and leans for support on a mistranslation, 'in appearance', for 'to the face'. The exact expression is found in the LXX. Deut. vii. 24, ix. 2; Jud. ii. 14. At Jerusalem St Paul's authority had been confirmed by the acquiescence of the Church; here it must be asserted in opposition to the temporising conduct of St Peter.

was to be blamed] Better, as R.V. stood condemned, convicted of dissimulation by the very facts of the case.

12. 13. The decree of the Council of Jerusalem had virtually exempted Gentile converts from the observance of the Jewish ceremonial law (see Acts xv. i. 5, 28, 29). It is probable that James, fearing lest the Jewish Christians should be led to claim the same exemption, sent delegates to Antioch to keep them steadfast in their adherence to it. This would be quite in accordance with his conduct as recorded Acts xxii. 20—25. St Peter had been taught by a heavenly vision not to call any man common or unclean (Acts x. 28). Before the coming of these delegates, he had boldly exercised his freedom in the Gospel, and had eaten with Gentile believers, not only at the Holy Communion and the Agape, or love feasts, but perhaps in social life. The Pharisees regarded such intercourse with abhorrence. They had murmured against our Lord, saying, 'This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them'. [To those murmurs the Church owes the three parables of Luke xv.] But on the arrival of the emissaries from James, Peter began to shew signs of timidity and gradually withdrew from the company of the Gentile Christians.
certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and

\[\text{withdrew} \] A word used of drawing off troops, and in nautical matters of shortening sail. It describes conduct the reverse of that boldness and impetuosity which had marked St Peter's previous course.

\[\text{fearing them which were of the circumcision} \] fearing to give offence to the converts from Judaism. Not for the first time did Peter learn by experience that "the fear of man bringeth a snare", Prov. xxix. 25.

13. dissembled likewise with him] Lit. practised like hypocrisy. They believed and professed that they might eat with the Gentiles, they acted as if it were unlawful to do so.

Barnabas also] or, 'even Barnabas', who as Paul's companion was familiar with his clear and unreserved teaching on the great doctrine of justification by faith—even he was swept away with the rising tide of dissimulation. This may have been the commencement of the dissension which took place so soon after between Paul and Barnabas, resulting in their separation (Acts xv. 39).

14. This was not a case for private remonstrance. The conduct of Peter and the rest was a practical denial of the truth of the Gospel, and, as such, could not but do widespread mischief. St Paul therefore took occasion to rebuke him in the presence of the whole company of believers (comp. 'I withstood him to the face', v. 11).

\[\text{according to the truth} \] Lit. 'towards the truth,' i.e. with a view to its maintenance and propagation.

\[\text{If thou, being a Jew...Jews} \] Various opinions have been held with regard to the limit of the address to Peter. Some suppose it to terminate in this verse; others with v. 15 or 18; most, at the end of the chapter. But a comparison of the abruptness of the opening words with the more calm argumentative style of what follows, seems to confirm the view that the actual words addressed to Peter are contained in verse 14, and that Paul passes imperceptibly into a discussion of the great principle which he felt to be at stake. It is possible that the later verses contain the substance of the Apostle's remonstrance with Peter, as they certainly contain the ground of the expostulation in v. 14. This is confirmed by the expression "We, Jews by nature"; but the whole passage has direct reference to the state and dangers of the Galatians.

not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, knowing that a man is not justified vivest after . . . Gentiles] Ever since his visit to Cornelius, Peter had associated freely and eaten with the Gentiles.

why compellest thou] How is it that now by your example you are forcing the Gentile converts to conform to the Jewish ceremonial? It is of course moral compulsion that is meant, that kind of influence to which new converts would be specially prone to yield.

to live as do the Jews] Lit. to Judaize, to observe the ceremonial law, as necessary to salvation. That no less is intended appears from v. 21.

15—18. Consider what is involved in our having embraced Christianity. We were Jews by birth, and not Gentiles, whom the Jews look down upon as 'sinners'. We were convinced that man cannot be accounted righteous before God on the score of a perfect obedience to the law, but that he is so accounted for the merits' sake of Christ through faith. We, I say, believed in Christ, that we might be justified (i.e. perfectly righteous before God in the imputed righteousness of Christ), we were found to be unjustified and therefore 'sinners', like those Gentiles on whom we used to look down, Christ instead of being "the end of the law for righteousness," would virtually be the minister of sin—all His work having failed to justify us, He would have ministered to a state of sin. But such a thought is not to be entertained for a moment. For to insist on the necessity of legal obedience for salvation is to build up an edifice which I formerly overthrew, and to reduce myself to the old position of a transgressor.

Jews by nature] by birth, not even proselytes.

sinners of the Gentiles] Rather, from among the Gentiles.

16. The force of the prepositions is obscured by the rendering of A.V. Literally, 'Knowing that man is not justified from (i.e. as the result of) works of the law, but through faith in Jesus Christ...even we believed on Christ Jesus, that we might be justified from (i.e. as the result of) faith in Christ, and not from works of the law; for from works of the law shall no flesh be justified.' In the language of St Paul man is justified from faith, and through faith and by faith (dative without preposition expressed, Rom. iii. 28), never for or on the score of faith. In Rom. iii. 30, God is said to justify "the circumcision from faith and the uncircumcision through faith", where the emphasis is not on the prepositions but or faith. This is clear from the fact that whereas in this passage God is said to justify the Jews from faith, in Gal. iii. 8, He is said to justify the Gentiles from faith, comp. Heb. x. 38, and Hab. ii. 4 LXX. Vers. In Phil. iii. 9, we meet with the expression 'the righteousness which is of God upon (condition of) faith'.
by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

but by the faith] i.e. but only through faith in Jesus Christ. The rendering of the R.V. 'save' is grammatically possible, but logically wrong, and, as a translation, not only incorrect, but misleading. The declaration of St Paul has its counterpart in the utterance of the believing heart—

Nothing in my hand I bring;
Simply to Thy Cross I cling.

A shipwrecked sailor was trying to save his life by swimming, employing one hand for that purpose, while with the other he clutched a bag of provisions which he had rescued from the sinking ship. When his strength was nearly exhausted, a vessel came in sight. He was descried and a rope thrown to him. He seized it with one hand. 'Lay hold with both hands, or we cannot save you'. He let go the bag of provisions and was hauled safely on board the friendly vessel. His life was saved apart from his provisions. But he found that it could not be maintained without them. See Appendix III. p. 87.

of Jesus Christ] that faith which has Christ Jesus for its object, and nearly—in Jesus Christ. It is explained by the words which follow immediately, "We also ourselves believed in Christ Jesus". The transposition of the names of our Blessed Lord in this verse is doubtless 'not arbitrary', though it is not easy to explain its force. It must be remembered that Proper names which are now mere designations to distinguish one person from another were originally descriptive. To those who thus regarded the name Christ as meaning the Anointed or Messiah, there would be conveyed a different thought according as it preceded or followed the more personal name Jesus. Any one who will read the passage aloud, substituting 'Messiah' or 'the Anointed' for 'Christ', will perceive, if he does not fathom the difference.

even we] Better, we also, as well as Gentile converts.

for by the works...justified] This is a quotation, not quite literal, from Psalm cxliii. 2. It is made also in Rom. iii. 20, being there introduced for a special purpose, as referring to Jews, by the words, "We know that whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law". It is here used for a similar purpose, and as a decision from which no appeal was possible. See note on c. iii. 22.

no flesh] a Hebraism=no human being.

17—21. The argument of these verses is somewhat obscure—an obscurity due, partly to the inadequacy of language to express the intensity of the Apostle's feelings, partly to the introduction of metaorphorical expressions, which elude the attempt to define them accurately.

St Paul, like other Jewish believers, earnestly desiring to escape the penalty of conscious sin, had abandoned all trust in the law, and had thrown himself entirely on the mercy of God in Jesus Christ. If he is But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid. For if I build again the things which now told that in doing this, he and they had foregone their privileges as children of Abraham, and reduced themselves to the position of sinners of the Gentiles (v. 15), it might be said that Christ is a minister of sin. Away with such a false conclusion! St Paul had swept away all notion of justification by obedience to the law, because he knew that a man is justified by faith apart from such obedience, and to build up the edifice which he had pulled down would be to stand self-convicted as a transgressor of the law. ‘I’, he says, ‘for one, through the law, through experience of its inability to give life, turned my back on it for ever as a ground of justification before God. I died to the law. Thenceforth, as a ground of justification, it was no more to me than to a dead man. I did this, not that I might be free from the law, as a rule of life, but that I should live the only life worth living—a life impossible to me so long as I sought justification by the law—a life consecrated to God. I have been speaking of dying. There is another sense in which I died. I am crucified with Christ, a partaker of His death, a death issuing in resurrection; and this resurrection life, which I share with and derive from my Divine Lord, itself not natural but spiritual, transforms my whole natural and earthly life, so that I live this latter in the faith of Jesus Christ, who loved me and gave Himself for me. I do not, like the Judaizers, set at nought that grace of God to which I owe so much. And yet to seek justification by works would be practically to nullify it: for if by the law man obtains justification, Christ's death was purposeless and superfluous'.

17. while we seek] Rather, while seeking, i.e. earnestly desiring. The reference is to the time when they embraced the Gospel. Hence, for 'are found', read, "were found", found ourselves in the same position as those 'sinners' of the Gentiles, whom we had been accustomed to look down upon, and needing, like them, a free salvation.

we ourselves] not necessarily, 'I and Peter' (see note on v. 14), but we who, as Jews, inherited the advantages of the chosen race.

is therefore...of sin?] Are we to accept the inference that Christ is the minister of sin? The word 'sin' has direct reference to 'sinners' in the former clause. The Judaizers might taunt the Apostle with the suggestion, that, as faith in Christ had made them 'sinners', Christ had become a minister to a state of sin.

minister of sin] The antithesis occurs 2 Cor. xi. 15, "ministers of righteousness". Is Christ, who is the author and finisher of our faith, employed in a service, which so far from emancipating men from sin, promotes sin?

God forbid] Lit. let it not come to pass! This formula is used by St Paul fourteen times to express a strong denial and utter repudiation of some proposition, either put forward by himself, or suggested by an opponent. "Away with such a thought!" There is of course neither
I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor. For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God. I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but God.

19. For it was through the law, through the conviction of its inability to give life, that I became dead to the law. The law demanded a perfect obedience, as a condition of justification. This none can render; and it was when I experienced its condemning power, that I fled to Christ for salvation. "When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died", Rom. vii. 9. Thus it was through the law that I died to the law.

20. I am crucified.] Better, I have been crucified. The mention of death and life suggests the Death which bore fruit in Resurrection.
but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. I do not frustrate the grace

The Christian is by faith 'incorporated into' Christ (Hooker). Of this incorporation Baptism is the sign and the pledge. Hence the prayer in the Office for Public Baptism, 'that he may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin; and that as he is made partaker of the death of Thy Son, he may also be partaker of His Resurrection'. Crucifixion, though a lingering mode of death, is yet as certain in its issue as that by the rope or the axe. Two robbers were 'crucified with Christ', on separate crosses. One was with Him in His Cross, and therefore with Him in Paradise.

nevertheless I live] more exactly, 'And it is no longer I that live'. The 'old man' is crucified. The 'new man' which has put on the Lord Jesus Christ, is clothed in Him, has Him as the principle of its life (ch. iii. 27). Christ is now "our life" (Col. iii. 4), and 'He that keepeth His commandments dwelleth in Him, and He in him. And hereby we know that He abideth in us, by the Spirit which He hath given us', 1 John iii. 24.

the life which I now live in the flesh] my life as a man on earth, since I became a believer. It is termed 'in the flesh', to shew that more is meant than the life of the soul. St Paul was no mystic. With him Christianity was not abstraction from the duties of social life. It elevated, purified, ennobled them. He claimed and used his rights as a citizen of Rome, while living as a citizen of Heaven.

by the faith of the Son of God] Rather, 'in faith'—a faith which has for its object the Son of God. The life in the flesh is lived in faith. This is the sum of practical religion. What a perversion of the truth to apply to those who withdraw from the world, with its duties, its trials, its opportunities, the title of 'religious'!

The object of this faith is not termed, as usual, Jesus Christ. It is "the Son of God". But that is not all. He, in His uncreated Majesty, as "the effulgence of the Father's glory and express image of His substance", could not win the confidence of the conscious sinner. But His eternal Sonship gave its value to His atoning sacrifice, and is "the source of His life-giving power".

gave Himself for me] = delivered Himself up for me to anguish, and shame and death. The same verb occurs in the passive Rom. iv. 25, "who was delivered up". Luther remarks on this passage, 'Here have ye the true manner of justification set before your eyes, and a perfect example of the assurance of faith. He that can with a firm and constant faith say these words with Paul, is happy indeed. And with these words Paul taketh away the whole righteousness of the law and works". See Additional Note, p. 90.

21. The word rendered 'frustrate' is used in reference both to persons and things, in the sense of setting at naught, treating with utter disregard and contempt. In ch. iii. 15 it is used of setting aside a of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that you 3 covenant. Our Lord speaks of those who despise, treat with neglect His servants, as despising Him, Luke x. 16. In Heb. x. 28 it is used of a presumptuous violation of the law of Moses.

I do not treat the grace of God with contempt, as if it were a thing of nought, as do the Judaizers. It was that grace which prompted the unspeakable gift, the all-sufficient sacrifice. And if man can be justified by his own obedience, the death of Christ is unnecessary.

rather, “died without cause”. Not, ‘in vain’, but gratuitously, without any adequate purpose or result. Deny, or ignore the atoning efficacy of that death, and it becomes aimless and superfluous.

CHAPTERS III., IV. (SECOND DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE.)

THE DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH DISCUSSED AND ILLUSTRATED.

CH. III. 1—9. JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH, THE DISPENSATION OF THE SPIRIT.

1. In the concluding verses of the preceding chapter the Apostle has not been directly addressing the Galatians. He has rather been following up his rebuke to Peter by an argument—a soliloquy—ending in a reductio ad absurdum. A doctrine which practically makes the death of Christ superfluous is impious and revolting. ‘And is this the doctrine which you were lightly disposed to accept? O foolish Galatians, to what spell of sorcery have you succumbed? Christ Crucified was lifted up before you as the object of faith. Instead of looking away (Heb. xii. 2) from all else to Jesus Christ alone, you allowed your eyes to wander to the Law and your own works, and so yielded to the deadly fascination of these Judaizing teachers.’

rather, ‘bewitched’, cast a spell over you, the allusion being to the time when they ‘so readily’ (c. i. 6) transferred their allegiance to the Judaizing teachers. The change so sudden, and so senseless, seems like the effect supposed to be produced by magical arts. This verb does not occur elsewhere in N.T., though not uncommon in Classical Greek. It is used of the spell which was supposed to be cast over persons, especially children, by the influence of the evil should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you? This eye—a superstition prevalent in ancient times, and still existing in the East, in Italy and among the Kelts in Brittany. The word sometimes expresses, as here, the baneful effect on the victim, sometimes the feeling of envy or jealousy on the part of the agent. There may be a combination of these two ideas here; for St Paul alludes (c. iv. 17, vi. 13) to the intense spirit of partisanship by which the Judaizers were actuated. that ye should not obey the truth] Rightly omitted in the R.V. The clause is not found in the best MSS., and has probably been inserted from ch. v. 7.
before whose eyes] ‘to whom, confronting you, Christ was set forth’. hath been evidently set forth crucified] This of course does not imply that they had actually witnessed His Crucifixion—indeed the tense of the participle ‘crucified’ (better, ‘as having been crucified’) excludes such an explanation. One verb in the original stands for ‘hath been evidently set forth’. Render, ‘was set forth’. The same word occurs Rom. xv. 4, where it is rightly translated “were written before”. It is not probable that this can be the sense in this passage, first, because there is no specific mention of our Lord’s death by Crucifixion in the Messianic prophecies of the O.T.; and secondly, because in such prophecies Christ could not be said to have been described as crucified ‘before their eyes’. Two other explanations (both in a figurative sense) have been adopted, (r) ‘was described as in a picture, was pourtrayed, or delineated’. This finds favour with Theod. Mops., Luther, Calvin, and others; and (2) ‘was publicly announced, proclaimed’. The latter sense is preferred by Bp. Lightfoot, on the ground of its being “the common word to describe all public notices or proclamations”. In Jude 4 we have a similar thought—‘whose names have been posted up as of men doomed to this condemnation’.
among you] Omitted in many MSS. and in R.V. If it is retained, it may refer to the fact that the doctrine of the Cross, ‘embracing the whole mystery of redemption by grace and freedom from legal obligation’ (Alford), had been proclaimed without reserve among them, not as a passing announcement, but in the systematic teaching of the Church.
2. Here the Apostle makes a personal appeal to their own experience. He might have adduced other arguments to shew the excellence of faith. But he confines himself to one question, which they alone could answer, and the answer to which is decisive. ‘Was it from (as the fruit of) the works of the Law that ye received the Spirit, or from the preaching of faith?’ Luther shews at large, by reference to the Acts of the Apostles, that ‘the Holy Ghost is not given by the Law, but by the hearing of the Gospel’. ‘Hereby’, he says, ‘we may see what is the difference between the Law and the Gospel. The Law never bringeth the Holy Ghost, but only teacheth what we ought to do: therefore it justifieth not. But the Gospel bringeth the Holy Ghost, because it teacheth what we ought to receive. Therefore the Law and the Gospel are two contrary doctrines. To put righteousness therefore in only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect the Law, is nothing else but to fight against the Gospel. For Moses with his Law is a severe exactor, requireth of us that we should work, and that we should give; briefly, it requireth and exacteth. Contrariwise the Gospel giveth freely and requireth of us nothing else, but to hold out our hands, and to take that which is offered. Now to exact and to give, to take and to offer, are clean contrary, and cannot stand together.

Received ye the Spirit] Once only (in the Apostolic commission, John xx. 22) does the expression, Receive the Holy Ghost occur in the Gospels. The reason for this is given, John vii. 39. But when our Lord had ascended into Heaven, He sent the promised Gift from the Father to them which believed. Bp. Middleton classifies the uses of the words, Spirit, or Holy Spirit, in N.T. (Doctrine of the Greek Article, note on Matt. v. 18). The word ‘spirit’ is not employed here in its personal sense, but refers to the gracious gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. These gifts were twofold, (a) extraordinary, miraculous and temporary; and (b) ordinary and abiding, that ‘fruit of the spirit’ of which an enumeration is given, c. v. 22, 23. The former were the credentials of the early Church, attesting to the world her Divine mission; the latter are a witness in the heart of the believer both to the truth of the Gospel and to his own share in its unspeakable blessings. But this distinction must not be regarded as exclusive. Miracles serve to confirm the faith of believers, and the holy lives of Christians are an evidence to the world of the power of the Gospel, and so of its truth. Both kinds of gifts are probably included here in the expression, ‘the spirit’. Comp. Acts ii. 4, 17, 18, 33; xiii. 17, x. 44-46; xix. 2-6; Rom. viii. 9-11, 13-16, 23, 26; 1 Cor. xii. 4-13, xiv.

the hearing of faith] The word rendered literally ‘hearing’ has two senses, ‘the reception, or act of receiving by the ears’, as in Luke vii. 1; 1 Cor. xii. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 8; and, the thing heard, or report or message, as in Matt. xiv. 1; Rom. x. 16, 17—in which latter passage it is =preaching. On the whole it seems better to take it in the latter sense here. Thus we have in strongest contrast the works of the Law and the preaching of faith. The Law said, This do, and thou shalt live; the Gospel, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.

3. The contrast is still maintained in other terms. Here the ‘flesh’ is used for that which is external and material, compliance with outward observances, as opposed to the spiritual principle of faith. These two “are contrary the one to the other”. It is folly, having begun your Christian life spiritually (v. 2), to finish it carnally—to descend from the higher to the lower, from the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus to the law of sin and death. The same collocation of the verbs ‘begin’ and ‘finish’ is found, Phil. i. 6; comp. 2 Cor. viii. 6.
4. Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if so it be yet in vain. He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. Know ye therefore that they, which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the (comp. Mark xvi. 20) and so it was with Abraham; he believed and was justified.

6. We must supply the obvious answers to the question of v. 5. Assuredly those miraculous powers followed the preaching of faith;

The quotation is from the LXX. version of Gen. xv. 6. [The Hebrew reads, 'and He counted it to him for righteousness'.] It occurs also Rom. iv. 3; James ii. 23. From the appeal thus made by St Paul and St James to the case of Abraham, it would seem that they regarded the passage in Genesis as affording common ground to themselves and all (whether Jews or converts) who acknowledged the authority of the O.T. Scriptures.

On the faith of Abraham, see Appendix IV. p. 88.

7. Know ye] Better indic. 'Ye know then'. So in Phil. iv. 15, where the punctuation in some copies of A.V. perverts the sense.

they which are of faith] This form of expression is common in Classical Greek. It means, 'they who come from, and so belong to'; especially of persons who range themselves as members of a party or adherents of a cause. The antithesis to 'those who are of faith' is 'those who are of the Law', Rom. ii. 8, or 'of the works of the Law', the same] Rather, these, and none others.

the children of Abraham] This was the boast of the Jews, "We have Abraham to our father", John viii. 39; comp. Matt. iii. 9. St Paul here adopts the same argument which our Lord used, "If ye were the children of Abraham, ye would do the works of Abraham'. He exercised faith in the word and promise of God. They alone 'who have obtained like precious faith' are the true sons of Abraham.

8. St Paul's appeal here and elsewhere to the authority of the O.T. as the unerring, irreversible decision is very instructive. This authority depends on an inspiration which is verbal, though not mechanical. The quotation combines a reference to two distinct promises, that in Gen. xii. 3, "And in thee shall the tribes of the earth be blessed"; and in Gen. xviii. 18, "And all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him". The true seed (children) of Abraham are 'they which are of faith'—not his natural descendants, as such, but all who, whether Jews or Gentiles, "walk in the footsteps of the faith which Abraham had in uncircumcision".

the scripture, foreseeing] The Scripture is here personified, as in v. 22. It of course means the Holy Ghost, by Whose inspiration the passage was written. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the usual formula is, 'As the Holy Ghost saith'. Such forms of expression as 'the Scripture said', were common in the Rabbinic writers.

The connexion of this verse with what precedes is this:—Abraham was justified by faith, and they who are of faith are his children. But on the authority of the same Scripture we know that this filial relationship is not limited to his natural descendants, for it was promised that in him all nations should be blessed. heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying; In thee shall all nations be blessed.

So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham. For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one preached before the gospel] Proclaimed the good tidings of justification by faith for all who believe. This announcement was made before, ‘a Gospel before Gospel times’, Bengel. Others explain it a Gospel antecedent not only to the Law, but to the institution of circumcision, Rom. iv. 11.

in thee] This is supposed by some to mean “as their spiritual progenitor”. Of course there is no reference to a transmitted and inherited faith. Dr Jowett’s explanation is undoubtedly right, “in thee, by anticipation”, that is, “as the progenitor of the Messiah” (Bengel). The blessing (justification) comes to man only from the atoning death and imputed merit of Christ. It was apprehended by faith in the case of Abraham; it is so apprehended by each one of his spiritual descendants. Thus, v. 9, they that are of faith (note v. 7) are blessed with faithful Abraham.

9. faithful] The original word, like its English equivalent, may mean either trustworthy or trusting, deserving confidence or exercising it. In the former sense it occurs 1 Cor. i. 9, iv. 2. In the latter (which is the sense here), John xx. 27, where it is rendered ‘believing’. The context will determine which meaning is to be assigned to it. A similar ambiguity attaches to such English words as pitiful, mournful, hopeful.

10—14. THE CURSE OF THE LAW. NO DELIVERANCE EXCEPT BY FAITH.

10. The mention of the blessing which comes by faith suggests the terrible alternative—the curse which the Law pronounces and from which it provides no way of escape—a curse from which, because of imperfect obedience, no man can possibly free himself.

it is written] Deut. xxvii. 26. A quotation from the LXX. The words are the conclusion of the curse uttered on Mount Ebal. Applying primarily to the Jews, they apply to all who seek to be justified by their obedience to the moral law, and not in God’s own appointed way, through faith. Bengel observes that the obedience which the Law that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them shall live in demands must be perfect ('in all things'), and unfailing ('continueth not').

11, 12. St Paul by reference to two other familiar passages of the O.T. confirms his assertion that justification cannot be by the Law. He has proved from Scripture that no man can be justified by a Law which pronounces a curse on all who fail to render a perfect obedience to its commands. He now from another Scripture shews that there is a way, opened by God Himself, in which sinners have found, and may find pardon and acceptance; yea, a perfect righteousness and the true life. The prophet Habakkuk declares, 'The just shall live by faith'. This cannot apply to those who seek life in the Law; for its condition is, 'Do this, and thou shalt live'. Entirely contrary and antagonistic is the condition of the Gospel, 'Believe and live'. It is not a difference on which St Paul insists. It is opposition between faith and works, grace and merit, the Gospel and the Law. When God justifies a sinner through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, there is no place left for human merit. If Christ's merit, appropriated by faith, is not sufficient to justify us, we are lost. If it is sufficient, our imperfect, faltering, sin-stained obedience can add nothing to that sufficiency.

11. in the sight of God] Better, before God, i.e. at His bar.

This forensic use of the preposition is common in Classical Greek. Comp. 2 Thess. i. 6; James i. 27; 1 Pet. ii. 20.

The just shall live by faith] The quotation from Hab. ii. 4, is also found, Rom. i. 17; Heb. x. 27. The literal rendering of the Hebrew, as given by Bp. Lightfoot, is, 'Behold the proud man, his soul is not upright; but the just man shall live by his faith'. In the LXX. the verse runs, 'If one draw back, my soul hath no pleasure in him; but the just shall live by faith in me (or, my faith)'. There is also a reading, 'My just one shall live by faith'. Although the Hebrew word, which is rendered 'faith', elsewhere means 'steadfastness', there is really no violence done to the original by St Paul's manner of quotation. The Greek versions support his rendering. And the expression 'faith in me', is equivalent to 'steadfast confidence in me': or if we adopt the other rendering 'my faith=steadfastness', we have that attribute of God 'who cannot lie', which is at once the correlative and ground of man's trust in God. Comp. Isaiah vii. 9, 'If ye hold not fast, verily ye shall not stand fast'. Dr Cheyne.

12. is not of faith] 'does not spring out of, or start from faith', but its principle is performance. This is clearly laid down in Lev. xviii. 5, 'He that doeth them &c.'. We observe that 'justification' and 'life' are almost convertible terms. He who by faith is made one with the Son of God, hath life—eternal life. Thus in Rom. v. 19 13 them. Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is

St Paul argues that as by Adam's transgression all his descendants were involved in condemnation, so by the one righteous act, the obedience unto death, of the second Adam, the blessing came to all men unto justification of life—a justification resulting in and constituting life.

13, 14. Reverting to what he said, v. 10, the Apostle shews how complete this justification is. The curse has been borne, and the Law is silent. The curse has been removed, and the blessing remains; descending in all its fulness on the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, through faith.

13. 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the Law by becoming a curse for us'. In v. 10 the Apostle has shewn that by the very terms of the Law, all who are under the Law (i.e. all who seek to be justified by their own obedience) are under the curse. To rescue us from that terrible malediction, Christ submitted to an accursed death. He, though sinless, bore, nay became the curse, that on us might come the blessing.

hath redeemed us] 'ransomed us', from the thraldom of the curse at the cost of a death of shame and anguish unutterable.

curse for us] 'Who', asks Bengel, 'would dare to use such an expression without fear of uttering blasphemy, if we had not the example of the Apostle?' Here, as in 2 Cor. v. 21, we have the abstract noun put for the concrete, to give force and comprehensiveness to the statement. Our Divine Lord in human nature was made sin for us—not a sinner, not even a sin-bearer, or sin-offering. He was identified with that which is the cause of ruin and death to the whole human race, 'that we might become in Him the righteousness of God.' So, here, He is said to have become, not accursed, but 'a curse'. The curse incurred by all, in consequence of sin, was borne by the sinless One in His own Person. He, like the typical scape-goat (Levit. xvi. 5, &c.) was the representative at once of the sin and the curse which it entailed.

for us] 'on our behalf'. The preposition does not necessarily mean 'in our stead'. The great doctrine of our Blessed Lord's vicarious sufferings and death does not rest on the narrow foundation of the exact force of a particle. It is the doctrine of the types and prophecies of the O.T. and of the teaching of our Lord Himself and His Apostles in the N.T. To the passages already referred to may be added Is. liii. 5, 6; Matt. xx. 28; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Tit. ii. 14.

Light is thrown by this passage on the narrative of the Brazen Serpent (Num. xxi. 7—9), which our Lord declares to be a type of His Crucifixion (John iii. 14). Why was the serpent chosen by God to be the emblem and means of recovery to the Israelites? One reason may be that it was accursed of God (Gen. iii. 14), and so a fitting type of Him Who on the Cross became a curse for us.

it is written] The Apostle makes good every step of his argument every one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit by an appeal to Scripture. By the Law of Moses (Deut. xxi. 23), it was ordained that the body of a criminal, who, after being put to death, was exposed on a tree, should not be suffered to remain all night; and the reason is assigned, “for he that is hanged is accursed of God”. The words, ‘of God’, are omitted by St Paul, not as inconsistent with, but as unnecessary for his purpose. Those who account for the omission of the words by supposing them inconsistent with the acceptance of our Lord’s self-sacrifice by His Father ‘as an odour of a sweet smell’ (Eph. v. 2; comp. Gen. viii. 21), seem to overlook the fact that if in any true sense Christ became a curse for us, it was the curse of God.

It may be objected, that the curse to which our Blessed Lord submitted was not the same curse as that to which all men became subject by their failure to render perfect obedience to the moral law—that it was, so to speak, technical, rather than moral. But a careful consideration of the passage in Deuteronomy will shew that the curse there spoken of applied not to the mere impalement of the malefactor, but to the violation of the Law, for which he had previously been put to death. The body of one who had “committed sin worthy of death” was not to hang upon the gibbet after sunset, lest the land should be defiled, for the curse of God rests upon it. “In the Scripture doctrine of the atonement, the believer is one with Christ, until at length Christ takes the believer’s place, and all that the Christian is, and all that he was, or might have been, are transferred to Christ”. Jowett.

14. The twofold result of our Lord’s obedience unto death, the justification of the Gentiles, and the gift of the Spirit, through faith.

Christ having satisfied the Law in its most minute demands, has abolished it as a condition of salvation, and has thus removed the wall of separation between Jew and Gentile. “They which are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham”, v. 9.

15—18. The Gospel a Covenant of Promise, to which the Law was at once subordinate and preparatory.

15—18. The Gospel a covenant of Promise.

The Apostle proceeds to shew the certainty of the blessing, i.e. of justification, to all who believe. It is secured by the promise of God—a promise which is an unconditional covenant, and which is not through faith. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto. Now to Abraham affected by the conditional covenant (the Law), given long subsequently. Both were from God. But while the latter was of the nature of a contract between God and the people of Israel, and required a mediator and attesting witnesses, the latter is a transaction between God and Christ, who are One, announced to Abraham long before the Law was given, as a promise to him and to his seed.

15. Brethren] Commentators note the softened tone of this address, as compared with the previous severity of rebuke. It is due to the influence on the Apostle's mind of the thought expressed in v. 14. Realising the share which the Gentiles enjoyed in Abraham's blessing and in the promise of the Spirit, his heart is enlarged with tender compassion, and with that love which is the first-fruit of the Spirit (c. v. 22).

after the manner of men] Lit. 'according to man', a familiar mode of expression with St. Paul. Rom. iii. 5 (vi. 19); 1 Cor. iii. 3, ix. 8, xv. 32; Gal. i. 11. The plur. 'after the manner of men', occurs 1 Pet. iv. 6. In all these passages the sense is "according to an ordinary human standard, as men commonly judge, or speak, or act".

though it be but a man's covenant] The word here rendered 'covenant' is used in the Sept. and N. T. of any settlement, agreement, or contract between two parties; or of an engagement by which one party makes over certain privileges or property to another for his benefit. This may take effect during the lifetime of the party so covenanting, or after his death. In the latter case it has the sense of a will, or testament. [From the fact that the Vulgate translates it by testamentum, the word testament is used wrongly as its equivalent in A. V., Matt. xxv. 28 and other passages, and also as the familiar title of the two portions of Holy Scripture.] In every passage of the N. T. (probably not excepting Heb. ix. 15—17, on which see Scholefield's Hints, pp. 100—104) the word should be rendered 'covenant'. The mention of 'inheritance' (v. 18) does not affect this statement, for the heirs of this covenant do not succeed on the death of its Author.

if it be confirmed] In the general case, the confirmation of the agreement would be attended by certain formalities, such as the slaying of animals (see Scholefield's Hints, referred to above), or, as in the particular instance, by an oath. Comp. Heb. vi. 16, 17; Luke i. 73.

no man disannulleth...thereto] When once it has been formally ratified, no man cancels it, or supersedes it by making a new one.

addeth thereto] Of course fresh clauses may be added for the advantage of the beneficiary. But no new conditions may be introduced. The force of these words is more apparent as applied to the particular case, than as a general proposition. The condition of obedience as a ground of justification, introduced by the Law, is fatal to the covenant of free promise made to Abraham. We cannot believe that God would have acted in a manner from which men would shrink as inconsistent with rectitude.
and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed,

In this verse St Paul lays down a broad principle of justice, recognised by honourable men in their transactions with one another, and from it he deduces the special inference.

16. ‘Now to Abraham were the promises spoken, and to his seed’.

and his seed] These words are emphatic. Had the promise been made to Abraham only, it would have determined with his own life. But it was the precious heritage of his descendants, not disannulled or superseded by the law given on Mount Sinai.

the promises] Used, as in Rom. ix. 4, of that group of promises made to the patriarchs, which were regarded by their descendants as their title-deeds to the land of Israel and all the privileges of the chosen race. But here with special reference to Gen. xiii. 15, xvii. 7, 8. At first sight these two promises seem to refer only to the land. But they include far more. The chief blessing promised is contained in the words, “I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee...and I will be their God.” Comp. Heb. xi. 16. It is interesting to notice how this promise was appropriated by the seed. On the Cross He cried, ‘My God, My God.’ After His resurrection He said, ‘I ascend...to My God, and your God’.

made] Lit. ‘spoken’, as in R.V. They were made orally, not, like the law, written on tables of stone.

He saith not] Rather, ‘it (the promise) saith not’. It does not run, ‘And to thy seeds’, &c. This clause is parenthetical, illustrative of, but not necessary to the argument.

Exception has been taken to the emphasis which St Paul attaches to the use of the singular ‘seed’, on the ground that in the Hebrew the plural ‘seeds’ would not bear the sense which he seems to attribute to it, viz. several lines of descent. The same may be said of our own language, in which ‘seeds’ can only mean grains, or kinds of grain—not lines of human descent. But, without insisting on the fact that in Hellenistic Greek (which St Paul was writing), the plural, no less than the singular, is employed in the sense here required, we may observe that the import of the passage is not dependent on rigid conformity to linguistic usage. The Apostle pauses to point out, that, though the promise was given to Abraham’s seed, yet it was restricted to one line. The descendants of Hagar and Keturah and the posterity of Esau were not included in the covenant. Similarly in Rom. ix. 7, 8, we read, “Neither because they are a seed (i.e. one of the lines of descendants) of Abraham, are they all children, but (so ran the promise), In Isaac shall thy seed be called”, i.e. the title of ‘seed’ par excellence to thee shall be in the line of Isaac.

but as of one] One line of descent, the spiritual seed, who are gathered up into and blessed in their One Head and Representative. which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

17. And this I say] This is what I mean. St Paul here reverts to, and continues the argument of v. 15, which had been interrupted by the explanatory words, ‘He saith not...is Christ’.

confirmed before of God] Confirmed by oath (see Heb. vi. 17, 18). This does not refer to the repetition of the promise to Isaac and Jacob, although by such repetition the promise may be regarded as extending over the patriarchal period down to the going down into Egypt. This makes the four hundred and thirty years agree with the duration of the sojourn in Egypt, as recorded Exod. xii. 40. Into the difficulty of reconciling this with the period arrived at by a calculation of the genealogies, it is not necessary to enter. (See Alford’s and Lightfoot’s notes.) For St Paul’s argument it is only necessary that the giving of the law should have been long after the announcement of the covenant promise.

in Christ] These words are probably a gloss; and are properly omitted in R.V. If retained, they should be rendered, “unto (i.e. with a view to) Christ”.

The covenant, ratified before by God, the law, having come into existence after the lapse of 430 years, cannot cancel so as to invalidate the promise.

18. The concluding words of the previous verse suggest the thought—‘Yes, the promise would be at once invalidated, if the inheritance were dependent on the law’. Law and promises, works and faith, are opposing principles, of which the antagonism is most clearly seen in their issues—condemnation and justification. We have a parallel passage in Rom. iv. 13; comp. also Rom. xi. 6.

God gave it] Has bestowed as a free gift. ‘The perfect tense marks the permanence of its effects.’ Bp. Lightfoot. All who enjoy it or shall enjoy it, do so as the gift of God’s sovereign mercy, unsolicited, unmerited, unconditional. To see the force of the verb here rendered ‘gave’, we may compare Luke vii. 42, ‘he frankly (freely) forgave them’, ‘made them a present of the amount owed’, Rom. viii. 32; 1 Cor. ii. 12.
Wherefore then serve\(\text{th}\) the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the 19—29. The Purpose and Use of the Law in Relation to the Justification of the Sinner.

19. If then the promise is not affected by the law, so that no new condition of justification is imposed by it, the question naturally arises, 'Why was the law given?' To this the Apostle has an answer ready. It was not given to limit, much less to supersede the promise. The promise and the law are like two circles, which touch, but do not intersect each other: each perfect of its kind, because both alike Divine in their origin. But in answering the question which he has anticipated, St Paul shews the inferiority of the law in several particulars to the earlier and 'better covenant' (Heb. viii. 6). (1) The law condemns: it cannot give life, because no man can fulfil its conditions. It provokes transgression, convinces of sin, and denounces punishment. (2) It was superadded as a parenthetical and temporary dispensation, commencing with the national life of the Jewish people, and terminating with the Advent of the Seed to whom the promise was given. (3) It was not delivered immediately, like the promises to Abraham, but mediatel}y by Moses in the presence of Angels as attesting witnesses. (4) It was a contract between God and man, life depending on the fulfilment of its terms, and was therefore conditional, and not absolute like the promise.

Yet not so as to interfere with the promise. If any one man had succeeded in rendering perfect obedience to the law, he would have been justified, no less than they to whom the righteousness of Another was imputed by faith.

Dismissing the explanations, 'to check' or 'to punish' transgressions, we may make St Paul his own interpreter. In Rom. v. 20 he says that the law 'intervened that the offence might abound'; in Rom. vii. 13, that the commandment was given in order that sin 'might be shewn to be sin...that through the commandment sin might become exceeding sinful.' Nay, he testifies that himself had not known sin 'except through the law' (Rom. vii. 7), for 'through the law is the knowledge of sin'. And yet further, 'the strength of sin is the law' (1 Cor. xv. 56). From a comparison of these and other passages we infer that the purpose for which the law was given was not on the one hand the restraint or punishment of sin, nor on the other the increase of evil in the world. The evil existed already and was active. But its real nature, as an offence against God, rebellion against His authority, was not felt until that authority was expressed in the form of command and prohibition, that is, of law. The barrier which obstructs the force of the stream does not add to its force; it reveals the force by the resistance which it offers.

till the seed should come] This marks the limits of its operation.

That is, Christ. Surely it was by no accident that the term employed in the Abrahamic covenant is the same which is used promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not a mediator of in the yet earlier gospel (Gen. iii. 15). The seed of Abraham is the seed of the woman.

to whom the promise was made] Lit. has been made. The promise was not annulled by the law. It continued in force, awaiting its fulfilment. This seems to be expressed by the perfect tense.

and was ordained by angels] 'having been enjoined, or enacted, by means of angels'. In Deut. xxxiii. 2 we read, R.V. 'The Lord came from Sinai, And rose from Seir unto them; He shined forth from Mount Paran, And He came from the ten thousands of holy ones: At His right hand was a fiery law unto them.' The expression, 'with ten thousands of His saints' is, literally, 'from (amidst) myriads of holiness'; or 'holy myriads.' The R.V. 'the ten thousands of holy ones' is not a literal rendering, but a paraphrase denoting the angels; and though the LXX. render the clause, 'with myriads of Kades', they add (apparently from a different Hebrew text), 'on His right angels (were) with Him'. The older versions and 'expositors generally agree in the common rendering'. Lightfoot. That angels were present as attesting witnesses at the giving of the law was a common opinion among the Rabbinic teachers, and allusion is made to it not only by St Paul in this passage, but by St Stephen (Acts vii. 53), by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. ii. 2), and by Josephus (Antt. xv. 5. 3). Regarded as the retinue of the Supreme Lawgiver, the angels by their presence added solemnity to the occasion. But that very presence emphasized the fact that the law was of the nature of a contract, conditional, not absolute, a transaction between two parties, not the spontaneous revelation of mercy by Him who 'is One'.

by the hand of] A Hebraism nearly equivalent to, 'by means of' or simply 'by'. It is so used frequently in the O.T., e.g. Num. iv. 37, when Moses and Aaron are said to have numbered the people 'according to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses'. See Acts vii. 35.

a mediator] The noun thus rendered occurs in four other passages of the N. T. (1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6, ix. 15, xii. 24), and in all of them refers to our Lord Jesus Christ. In the three latter He is expressly termed the Mediator of the new or better covenant. Here the mediator is associated with the first covenant. In the epistle to Timothy our Lord is a mediator 'between God and man'. Here the mediator is between God and the people of Israel, i.e. of course, Moses. These considerations, together with a due regard to the general scope of the passage, lead to the rejection of the view that in this passage the Mediator is our Lord—indeed such a view may astonish us, though supported by such eminent names as Origen, Jerome, Augustine, and Chrysostom. Neither the noun nor the corresponding verb (see Heb. vi. 17) is found in the LXX., though its reference to Moses in the one, but God is one. *Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the scripture hath concluded the passage before us is confirmed by his own declaration, 'The Lord our God made a covenant with you in Horeb....I stood between the Lord and you at that time to shew you the word of the Lord', Deut. v. 2, 5. The 'covenant' was the law of the Ten Commandments.

20. Probably no verse of Scripture has more exercised the ingenuity of commentators. Certainly of none other can it be said that it 'has received 430 interpretations' (Jowett), if by that expression contrariant or different interpretations are meant. Some notice of these is reserved for an Appendix (Appendix v. p. 89). The verse may be paraphrased as follows: Now the very fact that at the giving of the Law a Mediator was needed, marks the nature of the transaction as a compact entered into between two parties. The very term Mediator implies two parties between whom he intervenes. But the God of the promise is One and One only. He reveals Himself as the bestower of a free gift to the world. 'The Giver is everything, the recipient nothing' (Lightfoot). Hence there was no place in the Gospel revelation for a mediator in the sense in which Moses was mediator between God and the people of Israel. It may be observed that this view of the scope of the passage (which is all that is necessary to its connexion with the preceding and following context) does not militate against, nor is it inconsistent with, the declaration that there is 'One Mediator between God and man', (1 Tim. ii. 5). The young student of theology needs to be cautioned against the too common mistake of treating a verse of Scripture as if it were an isolated proposition, instead of regarding it in its relation to the train of thought to the expression of which it contributes.

21. Having thus sharply contrasted the two covenants, the Apostle anticipates an objection—'You say that God is One. He is the Author both of the law and of the promises. How then can there be the opposition between them which your argument would imply?' To this the answer is decisive. The difference is such as to display a marked contrast, not such as to involve antagonism. Otherwise God might seem in giving the law to have retracted the promises. Away with such a supposition.

For if there had been a law given...by the law] Life had been forfeited by sin; life must be recovered by righteousness. The promise assured life to the believer through righteousness imputed; the law offered life as the reward of a perfect obedience. Had the conditions of the law been less strict, or had man been able to fulfil them, then righteousness (and life) had come to men from the law. Hence there is no antagonism between the two covenants. 'To give life' was the end of both. The law failed to do this; the promise succeeded. Man could not obey perfectly: he could believe, and so obtain life.

22. But the Scripture, &c.] The impossibility (Theod. Mops.) of all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might obtaining righteousness by legal obedience is proved by the plain testimony of Scripture. It is noteworthy that in this momentous argument St Paul appeals not to conscience or experience, but to God’s Word written.

the Scripture hath concluded] Not the O. T. generally, but the particular passage referred to in ch. ii. 16, viz. Psalm cxliii. 2. This view is confirmed by the tense employed ‘concluded’, rather than the perfect ‘hath concluded’. This personification of Scripture is remarkable, investing it with the dignity and authority of a Divine utterance.

concluded] i.e. ‘shut up’, leaving no means of escape. The same word occurs Rom. xi. 32, ‘God shut up all men into disobedience, that He might have mercy upon all’.

all] Lit. ‘all things’, neuter. In the passage just quoted from Romans we have ‘all men’. This is more comprehensive, not because ‘no exception is made, not even in favour of the Virgin Mary, as the Vatican decree would require’ (Dr Schaff)—though this is true,—but because men’s purest aims, and noblest efforts, and holiest achievements are tainted with sin.

that the promise...believe] The promise is here put for the thing promised, justification, life. Bp. Lightfoot observes that the words, ‘by faith in Jesus Christ’ are not redundant. St Paul’s opponents did not deny that only believers could obtain the promise. They held that it was obtained by works, and not by faith.

This verse reveals the end for which the law was given—not to condemn, but to shew that by it was no escape, from it no escape, except by faith in the promise—in the Person promising and the Person promised. How beautifully Bunyan illustrates this great truth when he makes the Pilgrims who were shut up in the Doubting Castle of Giant Despair effect their escape by the Key of Promise, which Christian found in his bosom!

23. But before faith came] Better, ‘before this faith’, i.e. in Jesus Christ, ‘came’; and so nearly = before Christ came.

we were kept] kept in ward. The same word occurs 1 Pet. i. 5.

shut up] The passive of the same verb which is rendered ‘hath concluded’ in v. 22.

the faith which should afterwards be revealed] Here the word faith seems to pass from the subjective to the objective sense. It means the full Gospel revelation of salvation by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

24. Translate, so that the law has proved to us a tutor unto Christ.

our schoolmaster] The Greek word, ‘paidagogos’ (from which Engl. pedagogue) does not mean a teacher, but a confidential slave, be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as who had the general charge of boys, watching over their conduct and exercising discipline—sometimes, though not always, attending them to school. The sense is, that the legal dispensation, with its requirements and restrictions, was a preparation for the liberty of the Gospel. But while rejecting the narrow interpretation which would limit the office of the law to the functions of a schoolmaster or teacher, we must not (with some commentators) regard Christ as the Schoolmaster to Whose school the law conducted us. The contrast is not between the 'tutor' and the teacher, but between the state of tutelage and that of freedom see v. 25.

25. But after that faith is come] See note on v. 23.
26—29. The selection of the metaphor of vv. 24, 25 is by no means accidental. It suggests and leads up to the grand revelation of Gospel blessedness contained in the peroration to this chapter. The very fact that we were under tutelage proves that our true relation to God is that of sons, a relationship into which we all, both Jews and Gentiles, entered by believing in Jesus Christ. Of this relationship our Baptism was the sign and pledge and instrument. We therein became clothed with Christ. Our nakedness was covered with the robe of His perfect righteousness. He became the circumambient, enveloping element in which our new life is lived and sustained. And here the external distinctions, of Jew and Gentile, bond and free, nay, even that which has so long separated the sexes, disappears. In Christ all are united who by faith are united to Him. And if we belong to Christ, if we are part of Him, who is the promised Seed, then we are the seed of Abraham, we are heirs according to the promise.

26. Ye are] The change from the first person 'we are' v. 25 to the second 'ye are' marks a transition from an argument to an appeal. The converse is found 2 Cor. vi. 14, 16, vii. 1; 1 Thess. v. 6.

all] Both Jews and Gentiles—an indirect confirmation of the statement that the law is not against the promises of God.

the children] Better, sons. Comp. John i. 12 'As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them which believe on His name.'

27. The connexion seems to be, 'I say, it is by faith in Christ, that you are sons of God—a faith professed in your Baptism, by which you put on Christ. In Him all the old distinctions of race, condition and sex disappear, so far as the inheritance of the promise is concerned'.

The doctrine of Holy Baptism, as taught in this verse, has been the subject of discussion among expositors, some affirming that every person does in Baptism put on Christ, others denying that the Apostle is referring to the rite of Baptism. But surely neither of these inferences is warranted by the context. He is addressing those who by faith in Christ are sons of God. The 'all' of v. 26, and the 'as many of you' have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ’s, then are ye Abraham’s seed, and heirs according to the promise.

of this verse, have reference to those distinctions which were done away in Christ.

have put on Christ] This and the preceding verb are aorists, and should be rendered, were baptized, put on Christ. The two acts were definite and contemporaneous.

The metaphor may be taken from the white robe in which persons were clothed after submitting to the rite of Baptism. But St Paul uses the expression to denote a change of character, by which the person appears under a new aspect. ‘If any man be in Christ, he is a new creation. Old things have passed away; behold, they have become new,’ 2 Cor. vi. 17. The verb is of frequent occurrence in his writings, and its full force can be best understood from a comparison of those passages. Thus the things assumed or put on are, ‘the armour (or weapons) of light,’ Rom. xiii. 12. ‘The Lord Jesus Christ,’ Rom. xiii. 14. ‘Immortality,’ 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. ‘The new man,’ Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. ‘The whole armour of God,’ Eph. vi. 11 (cf. v. 14 and 1 Thess. v. 8). ‘Bowels of compassion, goodness, humility, gentleness, long-suffering’ Col. iii. 12. In Luke xxiv. 49 it is rendered ‘endued’. It is to be noted that in each of the offices for Holy Baptism there is a prayer that ‘those dedicated’ to God by the office and ministry of His Church may be endued with heavenly virtues.

The unity here predicated results from the putting on of the Lord Jesus Christ. Comp. Col. iii. 10, 11, where the train of thought is the same and the language very similar.

male nor female] Lit. ‘male and female’, possibly with reference to Gen. i. 27. The rite of circumcision was limited to male children; the Sacrament of Baptism is administered to both male and female. There are here no injunctions as to slavery and the treatment of women. But the principle laid down has by its application abolished the one and ameliorated the other. The Talmud everywhere assumes and often states the recognised inferiority of women to men.

ye are all one] ‘ye’ is emphatic, pointing to those who are ‘sons of God’, v. 26. ‘One person’, or ‘one man’. Comp. Eph. ii. 15; Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 12, 13.

If ye be Christ’s] If ye are by faith incorporated into Christ, the promised Seed, then by virtue of that living union ye are yourselves Abraham’s seed. The paraphrase of Theod. Mops. is remarkable: ‘If ye are Christ’s by reason of regeneration in Baptism, typifying your future likeness to Him, and if Christ is Abraham’s seed, it follows of necessity that you also, being His body, are the seed of the same ancestor as He is, and consequently heirs too of the promise’.

Christ’s] Our Lord Himself used this expression (Mark ix. 41) to describe His disciples. The blessed privilege may be abused, and vaunted in a spirit of sectarian rivalry (1 Cor. i, 12); but to 'belong to Christ' is the high dignity and the eternal security of every believer (1 Cor. iii, 23). The Apostle has established the assertion of v. 7 that believers are the true children of Abraham and heirs of the promise. 'Union with Christ constitutes the true spiritual descent from Abraham, and secures the inheritance of all the Messianic blessings by promise, as against inheritance by law'. Dr Schaff.

CHAPTER IV.

1. The word 'heirs' at the end of the preceding chapter suggests another illustration. In human affairs the condition of a minor is antecedent to the enjoyment of the liberty and the civil rights which accrue to him on coming of age. He is a son and an heir, but during minority his position is that of a slave.

*Now I say] This is my meaning, comp. ch. iii. 17.

a child] lit. 'an infant', the legal term to designate 'a minor'.

differeth nothing from a servant] rather, from a slave. It is doubtful whether this description (continued in v. 2) applies to a minor under Roman or Jewish or Colonial (Galatian) law. Cesar says that among the Gallic tribes a father had power of life and death over wife and children (B. G. vi. 9). It would seem from a passage in Gaius (Inst. i. 55 1) that by a local law a Galatian father had this exceptional power. We may however regard St Paul's description as generally applicable to the condition of a minor without reference to any particular code.

though he be lord of all] Though, unlike the slave, he is lord of all, lord, by right of ultimate succession, whether his father be living or dead. Our Lord uses a similar figure, John viii. 35, 'The slave abideth not in the house for ever; but the son abideth ever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed'.

"He is the free man whom the truth makes free,
And all are slaves besides." Cowper.

1 Bp Lightfoot considers that 'this view seems to rest on a mistaken interpretation' of the words of Gaius. It is however maintained by an eminent living jurist.
under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: but when the

the time appointed of the father] the time fixed before by his father for the coming of age. It is not necessary, as has been stated already, to refer this to any special law or custom. It is clearly what might have often happened; and it is mentioned because of its typical import. The 'fulness of the time' is the antitype to 'the time appointed', and 'the father' of the minor has his counterpart in Him to whom we cry, 'Abba, Father'.

3. Even so we] Both Jews and Gentiles, as such, i.e. before conversion to Christ.

elements of the world] The exact meaning of this expression is doubtful. The word rendered 'elements' is translated 'rudiments' in Col. ii. 8, 20, and there, as in this passage, it has the qualifying addition, 'of the world'. The senses assigned to the word are: (1) the material elements, which are supposed to constitute the physical universe, such as earth, fire, water, air and the heavenly bodies; and (2) rudimentary instruction, the alphabet of the human race, which it was taught in times antecedent to the Gospel revelation—a system of rites and ceremonies, the picture-lessons of its childhood.

It is used in the former sense in two passages of St Peter (2 Pet. iii. 10, 12) and is so understood in this place by most of the older commentators. Theod. Mops. explains it of the sun and moon, by which months and years are measured, and refers it to that observance of days and seasons and months, which the Apostle condemns v. 10. Others see a reference to the worship of the great powers of nature among the heathen, and the honours virtually paid to them by the Jews in their observance of weeks and years.

Most modern expositors adopt the second explanation, and suppose St Paul to represent "the religion of the world before Christ, especially the Jewish, as an elementary religion, or a religion of childhood, full of external rites and ceremonies, all of which had a certain educational significance, but pointed beyond themselves to an age of manhood in Christ". These systems are characterised (v. 9) as 'weak and beggarly' (see note there). In Col. ii. 8 these 'rudiments of the world' are placed in parallelism with 'the traditions of men', and are closely associated with 'philosophy and vain deceit' which Clement of Alexandria explains as referring to Greek philosophy. The expression here seems to include all those systems of religion and philosophy which prevailed in the world, prior and preparatory to the dispensation of the Spirit, the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Subservience to these was slavery. Of the Jewish ceremonial we read that it consisted "only in meats and drinks and divers washings and ordinances of the flesh imposed, pressing heavily on them, until the time of reformation." Heb.
fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of

ix. 10. Yet more burdensome were the requirements of Rabbinic Judaism, and of most heathen systems of religion.

of the world] Not only sensuous, material, as opposed to spiritual; but as embracing under various systems the whole human race.

4. the fulness of the time] The completion of the time of the world's nonage, corresponding to 'the time appointed by the father' in v. 3. God's appointed time had come, and man's need of redemption had been proved to the full. Thus the eternal purpose of God and the preparation of the world had their fulfilment in the Advent of the Incarnate Son.

God sent forth his Son] In the Gospels, and especially in that of St John, our Lord designates the Father by the expression, "Him that sent me". It implies that our Lord existed before His incarnation, that He 'was with God', John i. 1.

made...the law] Translate, born of woman, born under the law. The Son of God Most High thus became very man, the Seed of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head (Gen. iii. 15) and also the Seed of Abraham in whom all nations of the earth should be blessed (Gen. xxii. 18).

5. Born under the law, our Blessed Lord not only in His most holy life fulfilled all the commandments of the law, but in His death He satisfied its conditions by bearing its penalty, and redeeming us from its curse; born of a woman, He became the Head and representative of the human race, that in Him we might become sons of God. Possibly the wider rendering 'under law' may be correct, in which case the redemption includes expressly what it does by implication—all mankind.

the adoption of sons] Men become sons of God by adoption; Christ is the Son of God by eternal generation.

6. In proof of this, as in ch. iii. 2, St Paul appeals to their own experience. Man by nature does not regard God, much less does he pray to Him, as a father. If the Galatians have "the earnest of the Spirit" (2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5) in their hearts, it is a pledge of their inheritance (Eph. i. 14), a proof that they are sons of God. Comp. Rom. viii. 15, 16 (where the identity of the words employed is very striking in the original) "For ye did not receive a spirit of bondage again unto fear, but ye received a spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit Himself beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God."

sent forth] the same verb which is used in v. 4. The Father sends forth from Himself the Son and the Spirit.

the Spirit of his Son] 'A title more strictly adapted to this occasion than any other that could have been employed. We are sons of God, his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then because we have received the same Spirit as His only Son'. Calvin. He is the Spirit of Christ because given to Christ (John iii. 34), sent by Christ (John xv. 26) witnessing to Christ (Ib.).

crying] A word denoting intense earnestness of supplication. Here it is the Holy Ghost who makes intercession in the believer's heart (comp. Rom. viii. 26); in Romans (loc. cit.) the believer himself cries, Abba, Father. There is no contradiction in this, any more than in our Lord's promise, Matt. x. 20.

Abba, Father] The first word is Aramaic, and means 'Father.' In two other passages the same combination is found. From its use in one of these (Rom. viii. 15) which is parallel to the verse before us, nothing can be inferred as to its origin. But from the other (Mark xiv. 36), we learn that our Blessed Lord in His agony in Gethsemane used this form of invocation. Why He used it, we cannot say. Certainly the second word was not added by Him (or by the Evangelist) as explanatory of the first. In the repetition of the word, which expressed at once His faith and His filial submission, we have an utterance which baffles our finite exegesis. The anguish of that spotless soul, in the near prospect of the Cross and bowing beneath the load of a world's sin, found vent in words, the most fitting, yet (as language ever must be) inadequate fully to convey the deepest feelings of the heart. But we observe, 1st, that it was in deep suffering that these words were spoken. Suffering is a mark of Sonship. Comp. Heb. v. 7, 8 'Who in the days of His flesh, having offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death...though He was a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered,' with Heb. xii. 7 'If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is there whom his father chasteneth not?' And, 2ndly, the use of a Jewish and a Gentile word in that mysterious and awful cry reminds and assures us that in Him and by His Passion we both, Jews and Gentiles, have access as children unto the Father.

7. The conclusion of the argument is not stated didactically, but made emphatic by its personal form, passing from 'we' to 'ye', from 'ye' to 'thou'.

no more a servant] rather no longer in bondage (v. 4).

then an heir] By the Roman law all the children whether sons or daughters inherited equally, whereas by the Jewish law females succeeded only in default of heirs male. Comp. Rom. viii. 17.

of God through Christ] The reading which has most authority is 'through God'. It is unlikely that any transcriber would have adopted this reading, which is less usual, if he had had the received text before him. The expression 'through God' has the same sense as in ch. i. 1. It stands in antithesis to all human effort or merit, by the appointment and grace of God.
an heir of God through Christ. Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and times

Danger of going back to the observance of the legal ceremonial. 8—11.

8. Notwithstanding, is it so that you who once were idolaters and ignorant of God, yet after having been brought to the knowledge of the true God, are turning back to a system of ceremonial observances? If this be so, I fear the labour I have bestowed on you is thrown away.

The emphatic words in vv. 8, 9 are 'did service', 'to be in bondage'. The verb is the same in the original. The tense is different. 'Before your conversion you were in slavery—will you go back to a state of slavery? Then you served demons—will you now submit to the bondage of weak and beggarly elements?'

knew not God] Comp. 1 Thess. iv. 5 ‘The Gentiles, which know not God’. They might have known something of Him from the universe or from tradition or intuitively, but they did not like to retain God in their knowledge', Rom. i. 28.

them which by nature are no gods] The order of these words, so far as the position of the negative particle is concerned, is uncertain in the original. Adopting the A.V. we explain, 'which by nature (in reality) are not gods, but demons'. If however the negative stand earlier in the sentence, the rendering will be, 'which are not by nature, (not really, but only by repute) gods'. If the former be retained, comp. 1 Cor. x. 20, “The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God.” If the latter order be adopted, we may compare 1 Cor. viii. 5, “there be that are called gods.”

9. now, after that ye have known...are known] The word rendered ‘known’ is different in the original from that so rendered in v. 8. It here denotes more than the acknowledgment of God’s existence—a discernment of His character and recognition of His authority, on the part of man; approval on the part of God. The same English word is used in 1 Cor. xiii. 12 to render a still stronger verb in the Greek of which the margin of R.V. gives ‘fully know’ as the equivalent.

or rather] God knows man before man knows God—an humbling thought.

weak and beggarly elements] See note on v. 3. They are ‘weak’, powerless to give life (Heb. vii. 18); ‘beggarly’ (rather, ‘poor’) as contrasted with ‘the unsearchable riches of Christ’, the riches of that grace which came by Jesus Christ.

10. Perhaps this verse should be read interrogatively, ‘Do ye observe &c.? ’ or the construction may be carried on from the preceding verse, ‘How is it that ye are turning,......that ye are observing &c.? ’ years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

Ye observe] The whole meaning of the verse depends on the sense attached to this word. It is compounded of a verb which means to observe and a preposition which implies that either the purpose or the method of observation is bad. The simple verb and corresponding noun are commonly used in N.T. in a good sense, e.g. “He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me”. John xiv. 21, “Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; but the keeping of the commandments of God.” 1 Cor. vii. 19. But the compound is never so used. Mark iii. 2; Luke vi. 7, xvi. 1, xx. 20; Acts ix. 24. Comp. for the noun, Luke xvii. 20. St Paul is not condemning the observance of ‘days and months and times and years’ but their mis-observance. Jewish Christians might continue to keep them as hallowed customs of divine origin, but not as grounds of justification. These were not to be sharers with Christ in the great work of salvation. Bondage to these rudiments forfeited the liberty of the Gospel. Gentile believers were never bound to such observances, and if they yielded to the Judaizing teachers and submitted to the yoke of the Jewish ceremonial, they were no longer partakers of the liberty of Christ.

Compare Col. ii. 16, where not the simple observance is condemned, but the slavery which is involved in its being required for salvation, and the dishonour which is done to Christ by adding to His perfect righteousness. See note on ch. v. 2.

days] ‘sabbaths and fasts’. There is clearly no exemption here from the obligation of the observance of ‘the seventh day’. ‘The law of the Sabbath, i.e. of one weekly day of holy rest in God (the seventh in the Jewish, the first in the Christian Church) is as old as the Creation, it is founded on the moral and physical constitution of man, it was instituted in Paradise, incorporated in the Decalogue on Mount Sinai, put on a new foundation by the Resurrection of Christ, and is an absolute necessity for public worship and the welfare of man’. Dr Schaff. What St Paul condemns is the observance of the day in a legal spirit, in compliance with the minute and childish prohibitions of the Rabbinic system and as a matter of merit with God.

months] As marked by the ‘new moons’. Comp. Isaiah i. 13; Num. xxviii. 11 &c., or possibly the ‘seventh month’, Lev. xxiii. 24 foll.

times] Better, seasons, the great annual festivals, which lasted several days, as the Passover, the Feast of Tabernacles, &c.

years] Every seventh year was a sabbatical year and every fiftieth year a Jubilee. See Levit. xxv. 2—17.

11. I am afraid of you] Sad thought, that all the toil which he had undergone on their behalf might prove to have been in vain! The possibility of such a result softens his tone, and as he thinks of his own labours, he will appeal to them by their memory of the past—of their reception of him and of his message ‘at the first’.
Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all. Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the

The thought of having bestowed labour in vain has always been one of the trials of the faithful messenger of God. It was so in the case of Elijah (1 Kings xix. 10, 14), of Isaiah, (Isaiah lii. 1). It finds frequent expression in the Epistles of St Paul (1 Cor. xv. 14; Gal. ii. 2; Phil. ii. 16; 1 Thess. iii. 5). The assurance given long ago (Is. iv. 11) is still needed and still in force.

12—20. PERSONAL APPEAL.

The Apostle now makes a personal appeal, marked by deep affection and earnestness. “Brethren, I beseech you, become as I am, free yourselves from the trammels of the ceremonial law and of the Judaizing teachers, for I became as you were. To you who were Gentiles and ‘without law, I became as without law’ (1 Cor. ix. 21) that I might gain you to Christ. Copy then my example”.

Better, I became as you. I gave up much that was dear to me for your sake. Ye have not injured me at all] The exact meaning of these words is doubtful. Perhaps we should refer them to what immediately precedes. ‘I ask you now to make a return for my self-sacrifice. I am not complaining of your conduct in past time. That was deserving of praise, not of reproach’.

13. through infirmity of the flesh] Rather, as R.V. ‘because of an infirmity of the flesh’, owing to bodily sickness.

What was this infirmity? Most commentators identify it with the ‘thorn in the flesh’, 2 Cor. xii. 7. Bp Lightfoot (p. 169 foll.) enumerates in chronological order the different conjectures which have been put forward in early and more modern times. They are (1) some bodily ailment, (2) persecution, (3) fleshly desires, (4) spiritual trials, such as temptations to despair, blasphemous suggestions of the Devil. The most recent expositors recur to the earliest view of this infirmity—that it was some bodily ailment. Bp Lightfoot conjectures that it was ‘of the nature of epilepsy’. Between this suggestion and that of some defect of eye-sight, perhaps acute ophthalmia, it is not easy to choose. The passages adduced in support of this latter conjecture are not conclusive in its favour, though their cumulative evidence is strong. They are discussed in an interesting note by Bp. Lightfoot, p. 174, note 1.

at the first] Probably, ‘on the former occasion’, i.e. on the earlier of my two visits, mentioned Acts xvi. 6. The second or later visit is named Acts xviii. 23. We may fairly infer from the Apostle’s language that on the former occasion he had not intended to preach the Gospel in Galatia, but that sickness of some kind (probably acute disorder) detained him there, and that notwithstanding weakness and pain—distress to himself, and disadvantage to the reception of his message—he proclaimed the Gospel of his Lord.
14. And my temptation] The true reading is probably 'your temptation'. The Apostle's sickness was a trial of their faith. Like his Divine Master, he had no natural 'form nor comeliness' (2 Cor. x. 10), and when to this natural disqualification bodily disorder was added, they might well have asked if such a teacher had any claim on their acceptance.

ye despised not nor rejected] Very strong expressions, implying that there was something repulsive in the character of the disease.

rejected] Nearly = 'loathed'. The construction is simple, the 'temptation' being put for the 'sickness' which constituted it, and which they might have regarded with contempt and disgust.

even as Christ Jesus] An unconscious fulfilment on the part of the Galatians of our Lord's words, 'He that receiveth you, receiveth me', Matt. x. 40.

15. Where is then the blessedness ye spake of] The last three words are not in the original. They are a paraphrase (and so an interpretation) of the genitive of the 2nd personal pronoun. Does this genitive express the object or the subject of the noun rendered 'blessedness'? This noun occurs Rom. iv. 6. Here it may either mean 'your blessedness' (as A.V.), the blessedness which you experienced in embracing the Gospel of justification by faith apart from the works of the law. Or it may mean, your applause of me. On the whole the former is to be preferred, as bearing on the general argument of the Epistle. The latter is however in full accordance with the immediate context.

your own eyes] Rather, your eyes. Some have inferred from the A.V. that St Paul was suffering from loss of eyesight. But the emphasis is not on 'your' but on 'eyes'. ‘There is no sacrifice which you were not ready to make to shew your zeal and affection towards me’.

16. Am I therefore] ‘So that I am become......truth?’ The tone of the sentence is interrogative, rather than the form.

I tell you the truth] The reference is probably to the second visit to Galatia, when the Judaizers had begun to sow seeds of error and discord among St Paul's converts. He says 'I tell', not 'I told', because he has made no change in his teaching. Truth is ever one and the same.

17, 18. In contrast to the simplicity of his own teaching, St Paul exposes the party spirit by which the false teachers were actuated.

They zealously affect you] The sentence is abrupt, no persons being well; yea, they would exclude you, that you might affect them. But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you. My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ named; though St Paul evidently had in his mind those alluded to ch. i. 7. The expression ‘zealously affect’ is not very intelligible to the ordinary reader. The verb, which is rendered ‘affect’ in this same verse, is used frequently in N.T. with reference to both persons and things. Originally it meant to feel or shew zeal, jealousy or envy. From this sense the transition was easy to that of ‘desire earnestly’, ‘pay court to’, ‘seek to win or win over’. The word is used in a good and a bad sense by St Paul, e.g. 1 Cor. xii. 31 where it is rendered ‘covet’, i.e. desire, and 1 Cor. xiii. 4 ‘Love envieth not’. Here the meaning is ‘They seek to win you over to their own party’. Error must be maintained and propagated by proselytising and partisanship.

The whole passage may be paraphrased—'They seek to gain you to their own party, but not with right motives, nay, they would exclude you from my influence, in the hope of your reciprocating their desire for your adhesion. But let me remind you that a desire of this kind is only to be approved when the motives are pure and the object good. Under such conditions it is always good. Such were the conditions under which I sought to win you to Christ when I was present with you; such is still the case now that we are separated'. This leads up to the tender yet sad remonstrance which follows. In support of this view of the connexion and train of thought we may compare St Paul's words, 2 Cor. xi. 2 "I am jealous over you (I would fain win you, not from party spirit or for personal ends, but) with a Godly jealousy (or longing desire)". True love is always jealous.

Some copies read ‘us’ for ‘you’. The sense is the same. There seems to be an allusion to some attempt on the part of the Judaizers to induce the Galatian converts formally to renounce their allegiance to St Paul.

In the preceding verse the metaphor seems to be taken from the affection of husband and wife (see 1 Cor. xi. 2, 3). Now it is changed to that from a mother in travail.

A form of address expressive of great tenderness, common with St John, but used only here by St Paul. This verse may be a continuation of the preceding. But it is better to take it as an apostrophe, and to regard the particle ‘but’ (see note) at the beginning of verse 20 as resumptive of the train of thought from v. 18.

This had first taken place at their conversion.

The indwelling of Christ in the believer's soul is the principle of his new life. To restore this after a relapse is a task of deep anxiety to the Apostle. Calvin sees here an illustration of the efficacy of the Christian ministry. God ascribes to His ministers that work which He Himself performs through the power of His Spirit, acting by human instruments.

to change my voice] Most commentators understand this to mean either (1) to accommodate my speech to your requirements which I could do, were I on the spot; or (2) to change my tone from severity to gentleness. Mr Wood contends for a different explanation. He con­siders that St Paul's intention in writing this Epistle, was that 'by another's voice he might speak to them without delay'. He under­stands the presence to be 'a presence in spirit' as in 1 Cor. v. 3. The choice lies between the 1st and 2nd interpretation, of which perhaps the first is preferable.

I stand in doubt of you] Rather, I am perplexed about you,

21—31. The Allegory of the Two Covenants, Pointing to Liberty only in Christ.

21. The final argument is an appeal to Scripture, to that very law to which the Galatians were desiring to subject themselves. If they would but listen to the teaching of the law they would hear it declaring its own inferiority to the Gospel, the bondage of its children as compared with the liberty of those who are the children of God through faith in Jesus Christ and heirs of the promise. Calvin says that St Paul in these verses employs a very beautiful illustration of the doctrine on which he has been insisting, but that viewed merely as an argument it has no great force. But he seems to forget that the cogency of an argument is relative to the habits of thought of the persons addressed. Some of those employed by our Lord seem to us inconclusive, because we find it difficult to put ourselves in the place of the Jews who heard Him. To them His words carried conviction or at least provoked no answer, e.g.

under the law] perhaps 'under (i.e. subject to) law', legal observ­ances, used in a wider and less definite sense than 'the law' which here refers to the Pentateuch. St Paul adopts the well-known Jewish division of the O.T. Scriptures, the Law (or Pentateuch), the Prophets, the Hagiographa (or rest of the sacred writings).

The first is probably the meaning.

'It is recorded in Scripture'.

"It is written" is a bit unclear here, but it seems to refer to a generic statement rather than a specific verse. The rest of the text is well-formatted and readable, with proper punctuation and grammar. The commentary provides a detailed analysis of the passage, discussing the various interpretations of the text and its historical and theological context.

God having promised to Abraham that in his seed all nations should be blessed, Sarah, becoming impatient because the fulfilment of the promise was delayed, gave Hagar as a concubine to her husband. This resulted in the birth of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 1-3, 15.) Thirteen years later the Lord promised that Abraham should have a son by Sarah when she was past the age of child-bearing. This was fulfilled in the birth of Isaac.

24. which things are an allegory] Rather, 'Now all these things may be regarded as an allegory'. The facts are historical, but they are types (1 Cor. x. 11) calculated and intended to teach great spiritual truths, and they have their counterparts in the facts (equally historical) of the Gospel dispensation. We generally regard an allegory as a fictitious narrative. It may be so, as Bunyan's Pilgrims' Progress; but there is no indication in St Paul's language that he dissented from the common belief among the Jews that the narrative in Genesis was historical.¹ is Agar. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all. For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, heavenly Jerusalem, bearing children into liberty, and this is Sara'; but the explanatory clauses which follow interrupt the construction, which is resumed in v. 26, 'but Jerusalem which is above &c.'

which gendereth to bondage] Better, bearing children into bondage.
which is Agar] 'and this is (typified by) Hagar'.

25. The reading, the construction and the meaning of the first clause of this verse are uncertain, and have afforded matter for considerable discussion. The genuineness of the word 'Hagar' is doubtful. If it is retained, the sense will be, 'For (or, as some copies read, 'now') this term Hagar is the name by which Mount Sinai is called in Arabia', it therefore represents Mount Sinai, which is in Arabia, the country to which Hagar fled and which her descendants inhabit. 'The word Hagar in Arabic means "a rock", and some authorities tell us that Mount Sinai is so called by the Arabs'. Conybeare and Howson. But it is better to omit it, and the sense will then be, 'For Mount Sinai is in Arabia', the country of Ishmael's descendants, the offspring of the bondwoman. In any case the clause is parenthetical, and the following words refer to Hagar in the preceding verse:-'and this is Hagar (for Mount Sinai is situated in Arabia—the country of the Ishmaelites) and it (the covenant) corresponds to Jerusalem &c.'

and answereth] 'belongs to the same row or category, corresponds to', see note v. 22.

Jerusalem which now is] Here, from the addition of the phrase 'with her children' (comp. Matt. xxiii. 37), it is evident that Jerusalem stands for the whole Jewish people, nationally considered. It is contrasted not, as might have been expected, with 'Jerusalem which shall be', but with 'Jerusalem which is from above'; but the antithesis is not weakened. The Heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 2) is the same as the 'new Jerusalem' (Rev. xxi. 2) of the prophetic vision, which is even now the city and the home of every true believer (Phil. iii. 20). It is in heaven (or above) until the number of God's elect shall be accomplished, and then it will 'come down from God out of heaven', not like a bond-woman and an outcast, but 'as a bride adorned for her husband'.

and is in bondage] The reference is probably to the legal bondage to which every Jew, as such, was subject. But Jerusalem was at this time literally a conquered city, subject to the Imperial power of Rome.

26. the mother of us all] Probably we should read with R.V. our mother, where of course 'our' is emphatic. Comp. v. 31.

27. For it is written] The quotation is taken exactly from the Seventyvigit version of Isaiah liv. 1.

By the 'barren' we must understand Sarah, who was a type of the Gospel dispensation. Small and persecuted in its early days, the Church thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath a husband. Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise. But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so is it now. Nevertheof Christ has now ‘many more children’ than the Jewish Church could ever boast of. ‘She which hath an husband’ (rather, ‘the husband’) is Hagar, who took the place of Sarah in the conjugal society of the husband. She represents the Jewish people, nationally and ecclesiastically, and for a time enjoyed the peculiar favour of her God—a relation to Him which in the O.T. is frequently described as that between husband and wife. St Paul’s use of this passage of Isaiah in no wise interferes with its primary reference to the promised deliverance of Israel from exile and oppression. Those who overlook or deny a primary and literal fulfilment of the prophecies of the Old Testament unconsciously weaken the foundation on which the hope (or the belief) of a spiritual and ultimate accomplishment of them rests.

28. The previous verse is introduced parenthetically. The connexion is, ‘Jerusalem from above is our mother...and we, brethren, as Isaac was, are children, not according to the flesh, but of promise’. The same conclusion as that arrived at ch. iii. 29.

29. In Gen. xxi. 9, 10, we read, ‘And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said, Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac’. There is no specific mention here of persecution. But apart from the fact that insult is one form of persecution—a form in which the spirit of hatred finds expression when prevented by law or lack of opportunity from open violence—according to the Jewish tradition, Ishmael actually assaulted Isaac. And this hostility was perpetuated by their descendants. The Hagarenes or Hagarites are thrice mentioned among the enemies of Israel, 1 Chron. v. 10, 19; Psalm lxviii. 7.

even so it is now] Compare our Lord’s words (John xv. 20), ‘If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you’. St Paul could say this from his own experience. See 2 Tim. iii. 11, where after speaking of the persecutions which he had endured, he adds, ‘Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution’. From the Acts of the Apostles we learn that the chief originators of these persecutions were the Jews whose bigoted attachment to the Rabbinic system inspired them with a bitterness of hatred of the Gospel and those who proclaimed it. In the subsequent history of the Church the illustrations of St Paul’s words are written in letters of blood. But to those who suffer for the truth these persecutions are an evident token of salvation, and that of God, Phil. i. 28. They are ‘the marks of the Lord Jesus’, proofs of sonship, badges of freedom, pledges of inheritance.

30. There is nothing here to lend colour to the Rabbinic notion that Sarah was a prophetess. The Scripture simply records her words and less what saith the scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman. So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free.

tells us how Abraham was bidden by God to comply with her demand, Gen. xxi. 12.

shall not be heir] ‘shall in no wise inherit’. Utterly and for ever irreconcilable are Judaism and Christianity—salvation by works and justification by faith—the Law and the Gospel.

31. So then] Better, therefore. The conclusion is drawn from the whole preceding argument. It is the assertion of our liberty in the Gospel of Christ—freedom from the curse of the law, from the yoke of ritual observances, from the bondage of sin and Satan, from the burden of an evil conscience—an earnest of “the glorious liberty of the children of God”.

CHAPTERS V. VI. (THIRD DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE).

PRACTICAL EXHORTATIONS BASED ON THE PRECEDING DOCTRINAL TEACHING.

V. 1—12. EXHORTATION TO STAND FAST IN THE LIBERTY OF THE GOSPEL.

1. Many editors place this verse at the end of ch. iv., connecting it immediately with v. 31 of that chapter; ‘we are not children of a bondwoman, but of her who is free with that freedom wherewith Christ hath emancipated us. Stand fast therefore and be not again entangled with a yoke of bondage’.

But the received arrangement of the chapters is better. Chapter iv. is didactic; chapter v. is hortatory, and therefore properly begins with the injunction ‘stand fast’.

It is however interesting to note that in the original the last word of ch. iv. is ‘free’, and ‘the freedom’ are the opening words of ch. v. We have a similar instance of the repetition of a word in juxtaposition in Rom. xv. 12, 13, ‘In Him shall the Gentiles hope. Now the God of hope fill you......that ye may abound in hope’.

Here we may render, In the freedom then wherewith Christ made us free stand fast &c. The freedom thus bestowed is spiritual liberty which is quite independent of outward circumstances. St Paul in chains, a prisoner in Rome, exulted in it. Nero on his throne, the master of the world, with thirty legions at his back, was the miserable slave of his lusts. Luther beautifully remarks: ‘Let us learn to count this our freedom most noble, exalted, and precious, which no emperor, no prophet nor patriarch, no angel from heaven, but Christ, God’s Son, hath obtained for us; not that He might relieve us from a bodily and temporal subjection, but from a spiritual Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor and eternal imprisonment of the cruelest tyrants, namely the law, sin, death, the Devil.

Stand fast] perhaps, 'stand upright', not bowing your neck to the yoke of legal observances.
again] They who had escaped from the thraldom of heathenism were not to submit to the slavery of Judaism. They who had once tasted freedom in Christ were not to be again entangled in the bondage of the law.

2. St Paul here speaks with the Apostolic authority which he had vindicated at the opening of the Epistle, but which he has hitherto kept in abeyance while using argument, and remonstrance, and entreaty.

if ye be circumcised] St Paul and the other Apostles, and indeed every convert from Judaism, were circumcised. It is clear therefore that this expression (repeated in v. 3) must mean not the fact of being circumcised, but the deliberate submission of Gentiles to the rite by which proselytes were admitted to the Jewish Church, as if it were necessary to salvation. A better rendering would be, if ye submit to be circumcised. The act of such submission implied that a man sought salvation in and by the law, of which circumcision is the seal. But to such a man Christ and His righteousness bring no advantage. 'He who submits to circumcision does so because he stands in fear of the law, and he who so stands in fear distrusts the power of grace, and he who distrusts gains no advantage from that which is so distrusted'. Chrys.

St Paul, though as 'touching the righteousness which is in the law,' he was found blameless before his conversion, yet turned his back on it all that he might win Christ and be found in Him, not having a righteousness of his own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith. Phil. iii. 6-9.

3. By receiving circumcision a man voluntarily put himself under the conditions of the law, which were, 'fulfil perfectly and live: fail and die'. The tremendous responsibility thus incurred may have been disguised by the false Apostles: or the Galatians may have been slow to realise it. St Paul's appeal is to the individual conscience. 'Warning every man and teaching every man' (Col. i. 28) was his maxim as a minister of the Gospel, and it ought to be the maxim of all who claim to be successors of the Apostles.

4. The same great and solemn truth is repeated in different terms. "Christ shall profit you nothing" = "a debtor to do the whole law" (and therefore under a curse in consequence of failure) = "Christ is of no effect unto you" = "ye are fallen from grace". Similarly, "if 4 to do the whole law. Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace. For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of ye become circumcised" = "every man that submits to circumcision" = "justified by the law".

Christ is become of no effect] Lit. 'ye were cut off from Christ', brought to nought as regards any benefit accruing to you from Him.

ye are justified by the law] i.e. seek to be justified by the law.

ye are fallen] Probably, 'ye are cast forth' (like Hagar and her son), banished from grace. The Apostle is not here stating anything as to the possibility of recovery after such a relapse. His object is to make it quite clear that if righteousness (or justification) is sought in the law (i.e. by works) it involves the forfeiture of grace, and the forfeiture of grace is ruin.

5. 'For we on the contrary, we who are Christ's, through the Spirit are waiting for the hope of righteousness from faith'. The connecting particle 'for' has reference to the falling from grace. The gospel is a gospel of grace (Acts xx. 24). The Spirit is the Spirit of grace (Heb. x. 29). We have a good hope through grace (2 Thess. ii. 16). Righteousness (justification) is of faith that it might be by grace (Rom. iv. 16).

the hope of righteousness] This does not mean the righteousness hoped for. We who believe are now perfectly righteous, 'being made', as the Apostle says, 'the righteousness of God in Him'. It may refer to that sanctifying righteousness which is progressive, 'inherent in us but not perfect' (as Hooker says), the perfection of which is the aim and end of our earthly discipline. Luther understands the expression to refer either to the hope of a full assurance of justifying faith, or to the hope of complete deliverance from sin. Writing out of the fulness of his own spiritual experience he adds: 'Either sense may well stand; but the first, touching the inward desire and affection of hoping, bringeth more plentiful consolation, for my righteousness is not yet perfect, it cannot yet be felt: yet I do not despair; for faith sheweth unto me Christ, in whom I trust, and when I have laid hold of Him by faith, I wrestle against the fiery darts of the devil, and I take a good heart through hope against the feeling of sin, assuring myself that I have a perfect righteousness prepared for me in heaven. So both these sayings are true; that I am made righteous already by that righteousness which is begun in me; and also I am raised up in the same hope against sin, and wait for the full consummation of perfect righteousness in heaven. These things are not rightly understood, but when they be put in practice'. But it is better to understand it of that object of hope which belongs to and arises out of our justification. By the faith which appropriates the righteousness of Christ we become sons of God and heirs of His everlasting kingdom. The inheritance is 'that blessed hope and manifestation of the glory of our great God and Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ' (Titus ii. 13).
righteousness by faith. For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love. Ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth? This persuasion

6. Anxious to remove all possibility of a misconstruction of his meaning, St Paul gives a reason for thus connecting the inheritance with faith. The fact of being circumcised or of being uncircumcised in itself is of no avail to a man's salvation. If he is 'in Christ Jesus' he is safe; and he is in Christ by faith—a faith working through love. We have a repetition of this statement in ch. vi. 15 with the substitution of 'a new creature' for 'faith working through love'.

Abraham believed before he was circumcised, St Paul was circumcised before he believed. Therefore the being circumcised or uncircumcised in itself availeth nothing.

but faith which worketh by love] better, working by love. Most commentators regard this statement as reconciling the language of St Paul with that of St James concerning justification. But it may be observed that St Paul nowhere teaches that the faith which is without works justifies. He does assert (and St James does not contradict him), that man is justified by faith without works. Neither works, nor love, nor any other Christian graces, cooperate with faith in the justification of the sinner. They are the necessary fruits of a living faith.

The addition of the words, 'working through love', is an answer by anticipation to the charges of Antinomianism, so constantly brought against those who maintain the doctrine of justification by faith only.

7. The abruptness of thought and style is a marked feature of these two chapters. It is not always possible to trace the connexion with certainty.

Ye did run well] 'You were running nobly'. The metaphor is taken from the stadium—a favourite one with St Paul, c. ii. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 24-27; &c.

who did hinder you] who was it that threw obstacles in your way? There may be a covert allusion here to some particular individual, prominent among the false teachers, to whom reference is again made v. 10.

that ye should not obey the truth] The truth personified, and here equivalent to the Gospel which Paul had preached to them. These words have been transferred from this place to ch. iii. 1; see note there.

The verb 'obey' has the same root as the noun rendered 'persuasion' in the next verse, and they are in juxtaposition in the Greek. We have another instance of the Pauline usage pointed out in the note on v. 1. It is not easy to preserve the play on the words. It may be indicated by translating, 'that from the truth you should withhold obedience. The obedience which you are rendering cometh not from him who calleth you'.

8. This persuasion] nearly equivalent to 'submission, obedience'. Others take it in an active sense 'this suasion on the part of the false teachers, to which you are yielding'. The objection to this view is that 'persuasion' is a weak term to apply to those who had hindered them
9. cometh not of him that calleth you. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. I have confidence in you through the Lord, that you will be none otherwise minded: but he that

him that calleth you i.e. God the Father. The present participle is used here, instead of the past (c. i. 6), because the reference is not to the particular case of those addressed, but to that never-failing grace of God to which all ‘effectual calling’ is owing, Rom. ix. 11.

9. Leaven is that small portion of fermented dough which is introduced into the fresh lump of dough, and communicates lightness to the whole mass. It is employed figuratively in Scripture to denote the working of both good and bad influences, and is used both of persons and of principles or teaching—comp. Matt. xvi. 12; Luke xiii. 21. There is a reference, sometimes tacit, sometimes express (1 Cor. v. 8), to the typical prohibition of the use of leaven in the law of Moses, Exod. xii. 15—20, 34. This verse, which occurs again, 1 Cor. v. 6, seems to have passed into a proverb. There the Apostle is condemning the toleration of a single act of open immorality in a member of the Church of Christ. It was the concession of a principle, and whether it be followed by other similar acts or not, the standard of Christian morality will be lowered, and a laxity of tone will gradually pervade the spirit, and degrade the practice, of those who are called ‘not unto uncleanness but unto holiness’. Here the warning is against the insidious nature of the false teaching of the Judaizing leaders. The difference between that teaching and ‘the truth of the Gospel’ may appear inconsiderable, and the teachers themselves may be insignificant in numbers or in authority. But error, once admitted, is a virus which will gradually spread and poison the whole system of doctrine, or the whole spiritual life of the individual or of the Church.

10. An abrupt return to a more favourable judgment of the Galatian converts, while strongly noting the guilt of those who sought to unsettle their faith.

I have confidence...the Lord] ‘I’ (emphatic) have confidence with respect to you in the Lord’. The words ‘in the Lord’ are rightly explained by Jowett—‘all acts of the Christian being described as being done in God and Christ’. Comp. 2 Thess. iii. 4, ‘We have in the Lord confidence concerning you, that what we enjoin, ye both do and will do’.

be none otherwise minded] The verb here used denotes sometimes the exercise of the judgment, sometimes the bent of the affections—the whole mental and moral disposition in reference to an object. Its force will be best understood by reference to some of the passages in which it occurs. Matt. xvi. 23; Rom. viii. 5; Phil. ii. 5, iii. 19. In the last of these passages they ‘who mind earthly things’ are in contrast with those who ‘set their affections on the things that are above’ Col. iii. 2. The same verb in the Greek. troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross

Here, as in Phil. iii. 15, the meaning appears to be, ‘ye will adopt no new principles other than ye were taught by me’.

he that troubleth you] In c. i. 7 St Paul used the plural. Here by the use of the singular number he seems to have some individual in his mind. We may certainly reject the suggestion of Jerome that St Peter is alluded to. It is hardly likely that after mentioning him by name (c. ii. 11) St Paul would thus obscurely denounce him. Besides, though St Peter had by cowardly concession encouraged the Judaizing party, he held the same truth as St Paul and was not a ‘troubler of Israel’.

shall bear his judgment] lit. ‘the sentence’. More than ecclesiastical censure is meant. Used thus absolutely, the word must refer to the judgment of God, which the Apostle regards as a crushing burden. We are reminded of the words of Joshua to Achan, ‘Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day’. Josh. vii. 25.

11. Another abrupt transition of thought, rendering the connexion obscure and uncertain. It is however evident either that a charge of inconsistency had been brought against St Paul, or that the possibility of such a charge flashed across his mind. He could find no language too strong to condemn those who submitted to circumcision, and yet it was an admitted fact that he had himself circumcised Timothy. Did he not ‘yet’ (still) virtually preach circumcision, as he had insisted on it before his conversion? This was a specious, and if unrefuted, a fatal objection. Based on a fact, it must be met by an appeal to fact—the fact of persecution. ‘If I still Judaize, why do the Judaizers still persecute me?’

then is the offence of the cross ceased] This is ironical, ‘I suppose then the charge of the cross has utterly ceased to be a stumbling-block; so that there really is no reason why I should suffer persecution’.

the offence of the cross] The fact that Jesus died on the cross does not in itself constitute the offence of the cross. It is accepted by many who deny its atoning efficacy. ‘The offence of the cross’ in every age consists in this, that it cuts at the root of human merit in the matter of justification, whether in the form of legal observance, or holy dispositions, or good works. The Jews (as Chrysostom points out) accused Stephen not of worshipping or preaching Christ crucified, but of speaking against the law and the holy place. And if St Paul had preached Christ’s death upon the cross as a pattern of humility and submission, he would have escaped persecution. But he preached righteousness by the cross alone through faith, and they were offended. No more striking commentary on these words can be adduced than St Paul’s language, Rom. ix. 31—33, ‘Israel following after a law of righteousness, did not attain to a law of righteousness. Why? because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by works of the law. They stumbled at the stone of stumbling (were offended at the rock of offence); even as it is written (Is. xxviii. 16), Behold I lay in Zion a they were even cut off] Two explanations of this expression are given. All expositors however agree in translating the verb as a middle, not as passive.

(1) 'I would that they who are such advocates for circumcision would go further and practise self-mutilation, like the priests of Cy­bele'. This is the view of Chrysostom and has the support of the most eminent commentators, ancient and modern. Bp. Lightfoot remarks, that 'by glorying in the flesh' the Galatians were returning in a very marked way to the bondage of their former heathenism; and Dr Jowett considers that the common interpretation of the Fathers, confirmed by the use of language in the Septuagint, is not to be rejected only because it is displeasing to the delicacy of modern times.

(2) 'I would that they who are not merely teaching error, but stirring up sedition among you, would go further and even cut themselves off from you', i.e. that instead of remaining as a disturbing element in the Church, they would openly secede and sever themselves. In favour of this interpretation (which seems to be adopted by the R.V. 'even cut themselves off') the following considerations are of weight: (a) The word occurs three times (exclusive of repetitions) in the active voice in the N. T. and always in the physical sense = 'amputate' or cut through. It occurs nowhere else in the middle. And it is common for a verb to undergo a change from the physical to the ethical sense with the change of voice. (b) It is not met with in the middle in the LXX. The passive participle occurs once in the sense of 'mutilated'. (c) The word rendered 'trouble' you, is not the same as that used in v. 10, but a term descriptive of the action of those leaders who stirred up a body of disaffected citizens, inducing them to abandon their homes and live by warfare or depredation, comp. Acts xxi. 38. What wish more natural than that men with such sectarian aims should sever themselves wholly from the company of believers? (d) The coarseness of the former explanation is heightened by the abruptness of the wish. There is moreover no other allusion in St Paul's writings to the practice in question.

Between the two interpretations the student must choose that which approves itself to his judgment.

1 With the alternative in the Margin, 'Mutilate themselves'.
For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not

13—15. Liberty must not be abused.

13. St Paul seems to be recurring to what he had said in v. 7, the intermediate verses being a sort of parenthesis in which he wanders from the main line of thought. 'This submission cometh not from Him that calleth you—a little leaven, &c.—for ye were called unto freedom brethren'.

unto liberty] lit. 'on condition of freedom.' The terms (and so the object) of your calling were freedom.

an occasion to the flesh] By the word 'flesh' we must understand not merely sensual indulgence, but that natural selfishness which finds expression in the disregard of other people's rights and interests, 'hatred, variance, emulations', and the like. Patristic expositors take occasion to point out that 'the flesh' does not mean 'the material body', for many of the sins enumerated below as 'works of the flesh' have their seat in the soul. The effects of the Fall have extended to the whole man, that unrenewed nature which 'is become corrupt in accordance with the lusts of deceit' (Eph. iv. 22) and 'which is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be', see Rom. viii. 5—7.

by love serve one another] The service of God, and of man for His sake, is alone perfect freedom. Too much stress cannot be laid on the expression, 'serve one another'. Act as the slaves of your fellow-men. This is true Christian liberty.

14. 'You would go back to bondage; there is a servitude which constitutes liberty. You desire to be under the law; there is a law—the law of love—to which ye will do well to submit yourselves; for all the requirements of the law are met by the fulfilment of one precept—Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' Similarly in Rom. xiii. 8—10, 'He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law... Whatever other commandments there are, all are summed up in this precept, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself...love is the fulfilling of the law.'

thy neighbour] This term in the original precept (Lev. xix. 18) had reference only to the Jewish people, but our Lord enlarged its scope so as to include everyone whom it is in our power to benefit or injure, i.e. all men. It is so explained in the Church Catechism—'My duty towards my neighbour is to love him as myself, to do unto all men &c.'

15. To bite and to devour is to act like wild beasts. The words are of course used figuratively to denote attacks made under the influence of evil passions, and especially through the rancour of party spirit. These attacks would consist of abuse or slander, invective or innuendo, followed up perhaps by fraud or violence.

The result can only be mutual destruction—the ruin of both parties in the conflict.

16—23. THE SPIRITUAL LIFE OF LIBERTY INCONSISTENT WITH THE INDULGENCE OF THE WORKS OF THE FLESH.

16. This I say then] After affirming the great law of Christian perfection in v. 14 and pointing out the effects of its violation, St Paul proceeds to shew how alone the former may be obeyed and the latter escaped. The controversies and heartburnings from which the Galatian Church was suffering were due to the lusts of the flesh (comp. James iv. 1, 2). There was only one means by which the tyranny of these lusts could be resisted and broken—by the guidance and power of Him Who is the Spirit both of love and of liberty.

Walk in the Spirit] R.V. ‘Walk by the Spirit.’ This is differently explained, (1) by, or according to the rule of the Spirit, comp. v. 18, 25;
vi. 16; (2) by the guidance of the Spirit; (3) by the help of the Spirit;
(4) spiritually. For each view something is to be said grammatically.
All together do not exhaust the fulness of the expression. The points to be noted are (a) The antagonism between the Spirit—the Holy Ghost in all that He is, and works and produces, and the flesh with its appetites and works. (b) The absolute certainty of victory over the flesh to all those who walk in or by the Spirit. Unspeakably great as is the blessing of pardon and justification by faith, it would be an incomplete blessing but for the assurance of this verse. Freedom from condemnation cannot satisfy the conscience which God’s Spirit has touched without the assured hope of victory over the lust of the flesh. Walking denotes activity. The metaphor is very common in St Paul and in St John. To walk in truth, in darkness, according to the flesh, &c., are familiar instances. The word in the original is not the same as in v. 25, where not mere activity, but deliberate movement is intended.

ye shall not fulfil] The strongest negation possible. ‘Ye shall in no wise fulfil.’ Blessed assurance!

17, 18. I say ‘fulfil’—for I well know that the spiritual life is, and must be, one of conflict—you must fight manfully under Christ’s banner and continue His faithful soldiers unto your life’s end. The flesh, the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts’, is in deadly antagonism to the Spirit—to the new and Divine nature, and to the Holy Ghost its Author. These stand eternally opposed to one another; and as both exist in you, ye cannot always do such things as ye would;
comp. Rom. vii. 15—25. But if ye are led by the Spirit, this conflict implies not bondage but freedom—the freedom of sons; “for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.” Rom. viii. 14.

19—23. St Paul supplies a test whereby men may ascertain whether they are under the curse of the law or heirs of the promise.
flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envy—

First, the Apostle gives a list of the works of the flesh—not complete but comprehensive—the commission of which excludes men from the inheritance. They cannot plead the promise. It is not for such as they. They shall not inherit the Kingdom of God. Then follows, not an enumeration of the works of the Spirit, but a statement of its fruit. Vital Christianity is not a set of acts—a list of good deeds—it is a disposition of the heart—a character. If the tree is good, the fruit will be good; and by its effects ‘a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit’, Art. xii.

19...21. A fourfold classification of the sins here mentioned has been suggested; (1) sins of sensuality; (2) sins connected with heathenism as a religion (idolatry and sorcery); (3) violations of the law of love, in feeling and in act; (4) sins of intemperance.

which are these] such as, for example.” The catalogue does not pretend to be complete.

adultery] Omitted in the best MSS. Jerome, after observing that in the Latin copies ‘adulteries’ and ‘murders’ are contained in St Paul’s catalogue, adds, ‘but it should be known that only fifteen works of the flesh are specified’. It is included in the general term ‘fornication’, which here denotes all improper relations between the sexes, married or single. (Matt. v. 32.)

uncleanness] Impurity generally, but with special reference to those unnatural vices to which many heathen were addicted.

lasciviousness] Rather, ‘open, shameless profligacy’.

20, 21. The second class of sins are those which concern religion—idolatry and sorcery, or witchcraft. The word ‘idolatry’ is probably to be understood here in its literal sense, the worship of false deities, and not in the metaphorical and wider sense in which it is employed by St Paul, e.g. Eph. v. 5, a passage which is, however, strikingly parallel to this. Comp. Col. iii. 5; 1 Cor. v. 11. The connexion with ‘sorceries’, as in Rev. xxi. 8, seems to limit the meaning to the superstitious worship of the heathen.

The word rendered ‘witchcraft’ originally meant ‘the use of drugs’, then, in a bad sense, ‘poisoning’. Those who ‘used curious arts’ (Acts xix. 19) combined demonology or witchcraft with the use of drugs as philtres, &c. For an illustration of this compare the well-known 5th Epode of Horace.

The next eight ‘works of the flesh’ are those which are directly opposed to love of our neighbour or Christian charity. Translate, ‘enmities, strife, rivalry, angers, factions, divisions, sects, envyings’. The first four of these are enumerated in the same order, 2 Cor. xii. 20.

heresies] Rendered rightly ‘sects’ by Wiclif, Tyndale, and Cranmer, and also in the Rheims N.T. The Vulgate has ‘sectæ’. It means the formation of ‘distinct and organized parties’—a further development of ‘divisions’; see 1 Cor. xi. 18. It is applied to the Sadducees, Acts v. 17; to the Pharisees, xv. 5; to the Nazarenes, xxiv. 5.

past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the murders] Possibly this should be omitted with R.V. There is an alliteration between the Greek words rendered 'envyings, murders', which is lost in a translation. They occur together Rom. i. 29.

See the reference to Jerome in note on vv. 19—21.

drunkenness, revellings] Probably no better rendering can be found for the latter of these words. In Classical Greek it is used of those nightly revellings in which the wealthier young men indulged, when after an evening spent in debauchery they disturbed the quiet of the streets by ribald songs and noisy violence. Readers of the Spectator will remember that such 'revellings' were common enough in London at the beginning of the last century to provoke the rebuke of the moralist: Spectator, No. 324; Macaulay, Hist. c. III. p. 360.

Drunkenness may be secret, or it may result in orgies or riot. Eph.

and such like] = 'such things' in the following clause. The catalogue, terribly large as it is, does not specify every form of working under which the flesh manifests itself. 'Man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit.' Art. IX.

I tell you before...in time past] In respect of which I forewarn you, even as I forewarned you, when I was present with you.

they which do] R.V. who practise. Exclusion from the Kingdom of Heaven is denounced not against all who have at any time committed any of these sins (for who then can be saved?) but against all who remain impenitent, and who do not 'through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body'. In two other Epistles (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Eph. v. 5), St Paul uses nearly the same terms as to the sins which disinherit a man from 'the Kingdom of God'. The Kingdom is not the visible Church, in which the tares and the wheat grow together: neither is it the Gospel dispensation—a sense in which it is sometimes used, e.g. Matt. iii. 2; Luke vii. 28—but that Kingdom for whose Advent we pray in the Lord's Prayer, which has been the hope of loyal hearts from early days, the theme of Psalmist and Prophet, the vision of the beloved disciple in Patmos—not heaven, though 'of heaven', not earth, though 'on the earth'—the Kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world for the beloved of the Father, the adopted 'sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty'. kingdom of God. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. And they that triads. In any such artificial arrangement, there is a danger of limiting or torturing the several terms to make them fall in with a preconceived scheme.

love] This stands first, not as distinct from, but as including all the rest.

joy] ‘joy in the Holy Ghost’ (Rom. xiv. 17), manifesting itself in cheerfulness of demeanour, and so recommending the religion of which it is the fruit—not a selfish emotion, but a sun whose rays warm and gladden all within the sphere of its influence. The people of God are frequently exhorted to rejoice, e.g. Ps. xxxiii. 1, xcvi. 12; Phil. iv. 4, &c.

peace] In the conscience, pervading the soul, calming the passions, manifested in the disposition and conduct.

longsuffering] An attribute of God, 1 Tim. i. 12; 1 Pet. iii. 20; 2 Pet. iii. 15. Here it means, patience sustained under injuries and provocation.

gentleness] Rather, kindness. A term frequently applied to God, e.g. Tit. iii. 4, where it is rendered by both A.V. and R.V. ‘kindness’. So in the LXX. version of Psalm xxiv. 9; xxxiii. 8, &c.

faith] Either ‘fidelity’, ‘trustworthiness’; or ‘trustfulness’ as opposed to distrust in dealings with others. It may include both. The latter is the consequence of the former. The heart which is conscious of integrity is ever least prone to entertain suspicion.

meekness] A grace of the soul which consists in habitual submission to the dealings of God, arising from a sense of His greatness, and the man’s own littleness and sin. Hence the meek will regard all the insults and wrongs inflicted by men as permitted by God and a part of His discipline. This word is coupled with ‘longsuffering’, Col. iii. 12, with ‘lowliness’, Eph. iv. 2. For a critical distinction between them see Trench On N. T. Synonyms, pp. 142—148.

temperance] ‘self-mastery’, not to be limited, with some of the Fathers, to continence in the sense of virginity, or with many moderns, to abstinence from fermented drinks. The Christian, like the ancient athlete, ‘exercises self-control in all respects’. 1 Cor. ix. 25.

against such there is no law] There is a recurrence to what the Apostle had said above, v. 18. ‘If ye are led by the Spirit’ (i.e. if ye bring forth the fruits of the Spirit) ‘ye are not under the law’, for there is no law to prohibit or condemn such things as these. It is, however, possible to understand ‘such’, as masculine, such characters or persons. Comp. 1 Tim. i. 9, 10 where the law is described as aimed not at crimes but at those who commit them. Jowett observes that the law ‘neither prohibits nor enjoins Christian graces, which belong to a different sphere.’

24. they that are Christ’s] They who belong to Christ, who are His by redemption—or perhaps as in iii. 29, who are part of Christ. The same expression occ. 1 Cor. xv. 23. The R.V. reads 'They that are of Christ Jesus', which has the support of the earlier MSS.

The aorist may be rendered strictly—'crucified'; in which case the reference will be to their conversion and baptism. But in many passages of the N.T. this tense must be represented in translation by the English perfect as its true equivalent. Crucifixion is a lingering mode of death; and though the reception of Baptism was an overt and initial act by which the deeds of the body were mortified, yet such mortification is continued daily through the whole of the believer's earthly life. It only ceases when he is 'delivered from the burden of the flesh'. Compare the prayer for the newly baptized in the Office for Baptism: 'that he being dead unto sin...may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin'.

25. The mention of crucifixion suggests death—the death of 'the old man', which is the condition and birth of the new life in Christ. Very similar is the train of thought in Col. ii. 3, foll.

If we live in the Spirit, &c.] The word 'Spirit' in the Greek is a simple dative in both clauses of the verse. Of course it can be understood as such in the former, though hardly in the latter. Lightfoot renders, 'If we live to the Spirit let us also walk by the Spirit', supporting the rendering in the former clause by the well-known phraseology of St Paul, 'to live to God or to the Lord', Rom. vi. 11, xiv. 6, 8; 2 Cor. v. 15, and in the latter by the similar expressions in v. 16 and ch. vi. 16.

Other commentators adopt either the reading of the A.V., or that of R.V. which has 'by the Spirit' in both clauses.

The sense of the passage is—'If we are partakers of a new life of which the Holy Spirit is the Author, let it be manifested by our submission to His guidance in all our proceedings and actions'—or, more simply, 'if we really have spiritual life, let its activities be spiritual too.'

26. To soften the rebuke, St Paul uses the 1st pers. plur., including himself with those by whom the warning is needed. A walk directed by the Spirit of God will not lead to the display of strife and vain-glory or the indulgence of envy, all which are works of the flesh. Compare Eph. iv. 1, 2, 'I beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye were called, with all lowliness and meekness, &c.'
Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, let us not become, or appear, vain-glorious. The true Christian ought to regard all glory as vain and empty save that which cometh from Him who alone is God. John iv. 44. To provoke or challenge is the act of the stronger party. Where this is impossible, the heart-sin of envy may be indulged by those who lack power or opportunity of active aggression.

CH. VI. 1—10. EXHORTATIONS TO BEAR WITH AN ERRING BROTHER, TO CULTIVATE HUMILITY, TO EXERCISE LIBERALITY.

11—18. AUTOGRAPH CONCLUSION. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE AND BENEDICTION.

1. Brethren] The force of this word of appeal (as well as the general connexion) is weakened by the division of the Epistle into chapters. The previous chapter concludes with a warning against provocation and envy—sins utterly inconsistent with Christian brotherhood. We are reminded of the remonstrance of Moses, 'Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?' Acts vii. 26. The train of thought seems to be: 'I have condemned the unchristian spirit and conduct which you exhibit in cases where it is possible that you may be mistaken as to the gravity or the reality of the fault which you attack. I go further. Suppose a man to be detected in an overt violation of the law of God, a 'manifest' sin (v. 19): you are not even then justified in trying to crush the offender. He is your brother. You share his fallen nature; you are exposed to the same temptations as he. Let this thought lead to the exercise of a spirit of gentleness, and seek to restore such an one, to repair his fault, to recover him to the position he had forfeited.'

if a man...fault] In the Gk. 'even though a man be.' overtaken] 'surprised, detected.' It has been suggested that the reference is to some previous offence, the repetition of which would of course aggravate the guilt of the individual and might seem to justify harsh treatment of him. That such is the literal sense of the word rendered 'be overtaken', and that it is so used in Classical Greek, is true. But there is authority for the other rendering which better suits the context. The reference is not to the habitual or repeated offender, but to the case of one who by reason of the frailty of human nature had fallen into the commission of open sin. Such an one was the incestuous person at Corinth. The incident had recently occurred, when this Epistle was written, and could not fail to be in the thoughts of the Apostle. The language used by him in reference to it (2 Cor. ii. 6—8) should be compared with that of this verse. Paley (Hora Paulina) sees here an undesigned coincidence, confirming the genuineness of both Epistles. He does not, however, notice the application of the expression 'in a spirit of meekness' both here and in 1 Cor. iv. 21, to the treatment of an offender.

ye which are spiritual] Surely there is no irony here, as some suggest. St Paul is full of the great distinction—not always discernible

spirtual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. For if by human eyes—between those who are carnal and those who are spiritual—a distinction based on the contrariety (ch. v. 17) between the spirit and the flesh. There is a very solemn question suggested by it—Were they what they professed to be? If they possessed the spirit of Christ, they could not but produce the fruit of the Spirit—of which gentleness, or meekness, is one.

restore] The original of this word is used in a physical sense of repairing broken nets, Matt. iv. 21, of the gradual completion or furnishing of the material creation, Heb. xi. 3. But it is more commonly employed in N.T. in a figurative sense, see Luke vi. 14, where it is rendered "when he is perfected" R.V., and Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Pet. v.

In this last passage, as elsewhere, God is the author of this work of spiritual restoration and perfecting: but He employs human agency for its accomplishment—the agency of His Church, ministers and laymen.

such a one] not the habitual offender, but the fallen brother. Evangelical ethics lend no countenance to sin: they teach us to prevent further evil by the restoration of the offender. This cannot be effected by harshness of speech or bitterness of tone.

in the spirit of meekness] Contrasted by St Paul in 1 Cor. iv. 21, with the 'rod'; the spirit which should animate every Christian as distinguished from the judicial authority vested by Christ in the Apostles and rulers of the Church. This spirit is produced by the Holy Ghost, but the word is not used here in a personal sense.

considering thyself] The transition from the plural, 'ye which are spiritual', to the singular, 'thyself', 'thou', gives point to the admonition. The possibility of a similar temptation and a similar fall, may well temper their judgment with self-distrust, and so, with charity. There is, however, a distinct injunction to 'consider themselves', to observe carefully their own spirit and conduct, lest if their eyes be fixed not on their own goings, but exclusively on those of their brother, the Tempter seize the occasion to attack and overthrow them. Some expositors make these words, 'considering thyself, &c.' the commencement of v. 2. The received arrangement is preferable.

2. one another's burdens] Brotherhood is a mutual relationship, and entails mutual good offices.

burdens] This is not the same word in the Greek which is rendered 'burden' in v. 5. It denotes any weight which presses heavily on the body or the mind, as toil, suffering, responsibility, anxiety. In v. 5 the reference is to the burden assigned to man or beast, to a ship or other vehicle, to carry, corresponding to the English 'load'.

and so fulfilled] The other reading, 'and so ye will fulfil', has about equal authority.

the law of Christ] 'He calls love the law of Christ', Thdt., with reference to the new Commandment of John xiii. 34. The law of a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. For every man shall bear his own burden.

3. The connexion seems to be: Christ by precept and by example bade you bear one another’s burdens. To neglect this duty is to set up yourselves above Christ. He ‘humbled Himself’ for us. You will not stoop to comfort and help your brethren. This must arise from pride—from a fancy that you are something exceptionally exalted, whereas such notions arise from self-deception—a phantom which represents nothingness.

4. This is an individual matter—‘Let every man’, lit. ‘let each one’.

prove his own work] ‘test his own conduct’. Self-examination will lead to a true estimate of self, ascertained by comparison, not with the attainments of others, but with the requirements of the law of Christ. The result may be humiliation, self-abasement, shame; but the ground of boasting will not be that of the Pharisee, ‘God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are’, but of that other Pharisee, ‘By the grace of God I am what I am’.

5. For every man...burden] For no man can escape from his own moral responsibility. The verse reads like a proverb. The ‘burden’ is the ‘load’ of accoutrements and provisions assigned to each soldier to carry on a march. Others regard the metaphor as taken from shipping affairs, and render the word ‘freight’. This is quite admissible as a verbal translation; but the phrase, ‘each man shall carry his own cargo’ may appear less satisfactory. There is no paradox or contradiction to the precept of v. 2 except in the English version which renders two distinct words in the original by the same English word ‘burden’.

6—10. These verses, which are an exhortation to the exercise of liberality towards the Teachers of the Church, do not seem to have any obvious connexion with what has gone before. They may have been suggested as a particular application of the general principle, ‘bear ye one another’s burdens’. But we so often meet with a number of disconnected injunctions at the end of St Paul’s Epistles, that this abrupt introduction of this paragraph need cause no difficulty. The connecting Let him that is taught the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things. Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh particle, 'but' or 'moreove', omitted in A.V. is restored in R.V. The duty here enjoined is frequently insisted upon by St Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 11—14; Phil. iv. 16, 17; 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. He had already urged it upon the Galatian converts, as we learn from 1 Cor. xvi. 17. That he insists upon it again in such forcible terms would seem to shew that they were not prone to the exercise of liberality.

him that is taught: it. 'the catechumen'; one who is undergoing instruction. When we consider that most of the instruction in the Word (i.e. the Gospel revelation) was oral, and that it was not limited to preaching in the assemblies of the Church, but extended to households and individuals, the work of the teacher must have been very arduous, demanding all his time and energies. Hence the necessity of proper provision being made for his maintenance. Exhortations to this effect are found in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, a document of the sub-Apostolic age.

in all good things: Those earthly things which men generally covet are designated 'goods' or 'good things', Luke xii. 18, 19; xvi. 25. In all of these, whether money, or food, or clothing or the like, the taught is to 'communicate' with the teacher, share them with him.

Men who, like Ananus and Sapphira, seek to obtain credit for liberality, while keeping back that which is due to the Church and cause of God, may impose on their fellow-men, and may fancy that they can impose upon God. But they are themselves the victims of self-deception. They are moreover treating God with contempt. Yet He is not deceived, nor will He relax in their favour the universal law of His moral government, that as is the sowing, so also will be the reaping.

mocked: There is a terrible rebuke implied in the choice of this word. It is far stronger than 'deceived'. The word means 'to sneer at', and here denotes not merely the attempt to impose a cheat upon another, but the open gesture of contempt for one who is an easy dupe.

for whatsoever...reap: A proverb found in Classical writers, and used by St Paul with verbal variations, 2 Cor. ix. 6. See some striking observations in F. W. Robertson's Sermon on this text.

A particular application of the general truth just stated. True in the material world, it is equally so in the moral and spiritual. Embracing the whole sphere of human action, it includes the special case under consideration. Such as is the seed sown, such will be the harvest garnered. To hoard earthly 'good things', is one form of sowing to the flesh, and silver and gold are 'corruptible things'. To give liberally is to lay up treasure in heaven, 'where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt'.

soweth to his flesh: Some expositors regard the flesh as the ground into which, metaphorically, the seed is cast. It is perhaps better to reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

take it as that for the purpose of which—its indulgence and the gratification of its desires, men live and act. The word is used here, as elsewhere in this Epistle, of the unrenewed nature of man, in strong contrast to the spirit—the 'new man', the 'new creation'.

to his flesh] Gr. 'to his own flesh'.
corruption] That which he has saved and that which he has gained will turn to decay. But from the corresponding expression in the second clause, 'life everlasting', we must regard the 'corruption' as affecting the man himself, as well as his possessions and enjoyments. A course of self-indulgence corrupts the moral nature and ends in destruction. The sowing here spoken of represents the thoughts, desires, words, and deeds which go to make up the active side of a human life.

life everlasting] This life, like the corruption to which it is antithetical, is begun now (John iii. 36), although its full development is future; for 'the harvest is the end of the world.'

9. The metaphor which runs through these verses suggests a caution. The husbandman after committing the seed to the ground, 'waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it...Be ye also patient,' James v. 7, 8. The mention of 'life everlasting' might seem to make the time of reaping so distant as to grow dim to the eye of hope. It is difficult to go on sowing in faith and hope, but we must not lose heart, in doing that which is right in the sight of God (comp. 2 Thess. iii. 13).

It is not easy to express in English the verbal antithesis of the original: 'in fair doing let us not shew faint heart.'

for in due season] This promise is an encouragement to persevere. The phrase itself occurs 1 Tim. ii. 6; vi. 15; Tit. i. 3. Though here its chief reference is to the final award, yet God may see fit to grant to His servants in this life a kind of firstfruits or earnest of the great harvest in store for them hereafter. Even now they see in the good which they effect—in the mitigation of evil, moral and physical, the reclamation and conversion of souls to Christ—a proof that their labour is not in vain in the Lord. 'In due season' is 'in God's own appointed season,' whether sooner or later.

if we faint not] The same word is used, Matt. xv. 32, of the physical exhaustion produced by long abstinence from food. It differs from being 'weary,' which here denotes loss of spirit, relaxation of the will, and so discouragement.

10. A noble practical conclusion from what precedes.

The time of reaping is 'God's own'—the season of sowing, ours. But that season is presented to us as 'opportunity.' If we ask how we are to recognise and so improve it, the answer is given by St Paul (2 Tim. iv. 2) 'In season, out of season'—not waiting for occasions, but making them.
10. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

11. Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with

As we have] This may be rendered with equal correctness, 'while, so long as, we have.' It is so rendered in the Offertory sentence in the Book of Common Prayer, 'while we have time.' But the A.V. gives a good sense—'according as we have opportunity.'

unto all men] Though in the immediately preceding context St Paul has been enjoining liberality towards teachers, he feels that his premisses are wide enough to bear this conclusion. He here passes from inculcating charity towards all men to a special regard for members of the family of God. St Peter adopts the reverse order, when he exhorts Christians to add to 'brotherly kindness, love.'

of the household of faith] As the Church is frequently designated the house or family of God (1 Tim. iii. 15; 1 Pet. ii. 5; Heb. iii. 6), so in Eph. ii. 19 believers are spoken of as the members of the household of God. Here the form of the expression is varied. 'The faith' is rightly explained by Bp Lightfoot to be here nearly equivalent to 'the Gospel.' The bond of a common faith constitutes a new family tie. It united, and still unites men to one another, as children of the same Father, with a common home.

11—18. Autograph Postscript and Benediction.

11. Ye see] Better, imperative, 'see'.

how large a letter] Lit. 'in how large letters'. Many ancient and most modern expositors take this to refer not to the length of the Epistle—which is certainly not 'large' as compared with those to the Romans and Corinthians—but to the nature of the characters employed. It is curious that the exact meaning of this word rendered 'how large' should have been so far overlooked as to suggest the explanation, 'in how rude characters,' as though the Apostle called attention to his want of skill in writing Greek. This view might have been left unnoticed, but for the distinguished name of Chrysostom, who among others maintains it. A second explanation supposes that St Paul, in calling attention to the large characters which he used, intended to hint at the cause, either general bodily ill-health, or local infirmity, such as weak eyesight. If this latter suggestion be adopted, it will confirm the hypothesis mentioned in the note on ch. iv. 13. But it is on the whole more probable that the largeness of the letters was intended to express the importance of the message to be conveyed. To those who have studied carefully the character of the great Apostle this view, suggested by the ablest of his early commentators and adopted by the greatest of modern expositors of his Epistles, will commend itself as in keeping with what we know of the man, and as congruous with any just estimate of the scope of the Epistle itself. In the verses which follow St Paul sums up the whole argument of the Epistle, a weighty argument on a cardinal doctrine, gathered up in a summary, mine own hand. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest weighty and powerful, and emphasised by the very characters in which it was written, ‘Golden words, proportionately transcribed.’

But do the words, ‘See in what large letters I write unto you with mine own hand,’ apply to the whole Epistle, or only to this concluding paragraph? It may be admitted that so far as the words employed in this verse are concerned, either alternative may be adopted. Alford is of opinion that ‘on account of the peculiar character of this Epistle, St Paul wrote it all with his own hand,—as he did the Pastoral Epistles,’ and he finds ‘confirmation of this, in the partial resemblance of its style to those Epistles.’ Others with more probability regard the Apostle as having employed an amanuensis thus far, and at this verse to have taken the pen into his own hand. The reasons assigned for this conclusion are drawn from what we know of his practice in other Epistles. It seems from an expression in 2 Thess. ii. 2, where he cautions his converts against being unsettled ‘by epistle as from us,’ that letters had been forged purporting to have been written by him—such forgeries were not uncommon in the subsequent history of the early Church—and as a mark of genuineness he adopted the practice of adding at the end of his Epistles a few lines in his own hand, the rest having been written by Tertius, or some other amanuensis. Thus, 2 Thess. iii. 17, ‘The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every Epistle: so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all.’ Comp. Rom. xvi. 22 foll.; 1 Cor. xvi. 21-24; Col. iv. 18.

12. Reverting to the error which had perhaps suggested, and which certainly occupies so prominent a place in the Epistle, St Paul unmasks those who were its authors and propagators; contrasting their conduct and motives with his own.

All who desire to make a fair shew in externals, these it is who constrain you to submit to the external rite of circumcision—and this, not because they are zealous for the law, but only that they may escape persecution for the Cross of Christ.

to make a fair shew] ‘to present a fair outside to the world’, like the scribes and Pharisees, who were compared by our Lord to ‘whited sepulchres, which outwardly are fair to look upon, but within are full of dead men’s bones and all uncleanness,’ Matt. xxiii. 27.

in the flesh] in that which is simply external, with close reference to the rite of circumcision, and in sharp contrast to that principle of faith of which a Crucified Saviour is the object and ‘a new creature’ the result. A careful consideration of Phil. iii. 3—5, will help to the understanding of St Paul’s use of this phrase. ‘We are the circumcision, who worship God in Spirit, and glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh: though I myself might even have confidence in the flesh...circumcised the eighth day, &c.’ Comp. Rom. ii. 28, 29 where ‘circumcision in the flesh’, the material rite, is contrasted with ‘circumcision of the heart, in spirit &c.’

they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh. But God forbid that I should glory, save in the only lest] Not because they care for the Law, but solely because they lack courage to face the persecution which attends the doctrine of the Cross.

for the cross of Christ] Lit. 'by' i.e. because of the Cross of Christ. If the false teachers constrain you to be, 'make it necessary' that you be circumcised, it implies that Christ's death on the Cross is not sufficient for your salvation. To believe in, and to proclaim that sufficiency, has in all ages constituted 'the offence of the Cross,' and has brought obloquy and ill-usage on those who so believe and confess it. This is to suffer persecution for the Cross of Christ.

13. He justifies the imputation of a bad motive, by a fact which cannot be denied. The Judaizers could not pretend that they so complied with the terms of the Law as perfectly to fulfil its requirements. They could not be justified by the Law. They acknowledged in some sense their need of Christ. And if so, why impose one of the legal ceremonies as necessary to salvation? Their real object is to gain a party triumph, that they may make Christian converts into Jewish proselytes.

neither they themselves] Better, 'not even they themselves'.

who are circumcised] Lit. 'the circumcised', those on whom the rite is imposed as a condition of salvation, and therefore of course those also who imposed it. Another rendering, for which there is considerable authority, is, 'who have been circumcised'. It does not, however, suit the argument so well as the present participle.

keep the law] This does not refer, as some suppose, to the impossibility of keeping strictly the ceremonial law, owing to the distance of many from Jerusalem and similar causes, nor to the insincerity of the men themselves, who were not enough in earnest to observe it rigorously; but, as explained above, to the moral impossibility of fulfilling the Law, on which St Paul so frequently insists, owing to the fallen nature of man.

glory in your flesh] boast in your submission to an outward ordinance. See note on v. 12. In the later history of the Church there have been instances of the same tendency on the part of those who have gloried in the number of converts admitted to Baptism, without regard to the spiritual change of which it is the token and pledge.

14. We might have expected that St Paul would have named 'the Spirit' or 'the new creature' as the object of his boasting, in immediate contrast with 'the flesh', the seat of the outward rite, in which the false teachers gloried. He does mention it at the end of v. 15. But he here names that which is the root and source of 'peace and mercy' in this present life and of eternal salvation in the life to come. There is nearly the same contrast in Phil. iii. 3 with the verbal substitution of 'Christ Jesus' for the 'Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ'.
cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world. For in Christ Jesus neither but God forbid that I] The personal pronoun stands first in the Greek and is emphatic. ‘Others would find cause for boasting in a fleshly rite: but for my part, God forbid that I should glory &c.’ See ch. ii. 17, note.

in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ] ‘in the atoning death, as my means of reconciliation with God’ Alford. ‘Not in my suffering for Christ, but in His sufferings for me’. Lightfoot. Compare the well-known hymn, ‘When I survey the wondrous Cross &c.’ It is a death of shame and ignominy, pronounced to be accursed of God, in which St Paul will glory—nay, he rejects every other ground of boasting but this alone. Such a declaration would be the raving of a maniac, unless Jesus were the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

by whom] R.V., ‘through which’. Commentators are not agreed as to the antecedent to the relative pronoun. Is it the Cross, or Christ Himself? The Greek admits of either. We have few data by which to decide. But practically it matters little. The Cross does not, it cannot mean the material Cross on which our Saviour died. That has long ago ceased to exist in its original form, even if the tradition of its discovery could be historically established. (See an interesting Article by the Rev. R. Sinker in Smith’s Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, on the Finding of the Cross.) If we read ‘by which’, the reference is not to a cross, but to the Cross, i.e. the atoning death of Christ; if ‘by whom’, it is not Christ as the glorified Son of Man, but Christ crucified that is referred to.

the world is crucified] Lit., ‘has been crucified’. It is not easy to define exactly the meaning of the term ‘world’. Alford explains it as ‘the whole system of unspiritual and unchristian men and things’. Its force may be inferred from St Paul’s use of it elsewhere, e.g. 1 Cor. ii. 12; Eph. ii. 2. Comp. James i. 27, iv. 4; 1 John ii. 15, 16, 19.

The world with its passing interests, its narrowly limited aims, its sordid gains, its perishable treasure, its hollow show, its mockery of satisfaction—is to me like yon felon slave, nailed to the cross dying by a certain and shameful, if a lingering death. And I too am so regarded by the world. It is an object of contempt and relinquishment to me, and I to it. We seem to hear the echo of our Saviour’s own words, words so hard to understand, so much harder to act upon, Luke xiv. 26.

15. See note on ch. v. 6. There the all-important thing is ‘faith working by love; here ‘a new creature’; in 1 Cor. vii. 19, ‘the keeping of God’s commandments’. All these are essential—the being circumcised or not is in itself a matter of indifference. Why? Because the latter is an outward rite. It may be nothing more. But faith, regeneration, obedience—these are spiritual—and they are everything.

The words ‘in Christ Jesus’ are omitted in R.V., and for ‘availeth’ we have ‘is’. The change, for which there is ample authority, does not affect the sense. circumcision availeth any thing; nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

a new creature] The word so rendered here and in 2 Cor. v. 17 originally had the abstract sense of 'creation', 'the act of creating'—and from that, the concrete, 'that which is created', including the individual, and so= 'creature'. It is to be observed that the same word is used of the calling into being of the material universe which is here (and elsewhere) used of the change which is produced in the individual soul by the operation of the Holy Ghost, when a man is brought out of a state of nature into a state of grace. Compare Mark x. 6; xiii. 19; Rom. i. 20; and especially Rev. iv. 11 with Eph. ii. 10; iv. 24.

16. as many as walk] See note on ch. v. 25. Some commentators attach to this verb a different sense, 'as many as conform to this rule'. But the A. V. gives what is probably a correct rendering. The reading 'shall walk', adopted by R. V. is on the whole preferable on MSS. authority. At the time when the Epistle was written believers were comparatively few in number, but the blessing was a prophecy extending to all who in the long series of centuries, even to the end of the dispensation, should walk, that is, live by the same rule.

this rule] This word originally meant a carpenter's rod or rule for guiding and testing his work, or the tongue of a balance. Then, any standard by which to regulate procedure or conduct. The transition to the sense of a model or pattern was not difficult. It is of frequent occurrence in different applications in ecclesiastical literature. See Article 'Canon' in Dict. of Christian Antiquities, and Westcott On the Canon, App. A.

Here 'this rule' is the principle of justification through faith in the Atoning Blood, and the renewal of man's nature by the Holy Ghost. 'As many as walk by it'—whether circumcised or not—in every age, in every clime—male or female—slave or free, without distinction of visible Church or sect. Surely this must be that 'great multitude which no man can number', of whom it is written 'they washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb', Rev. vii. 13.

peace be on them, and mercy] This is probably a prayer, 'May peace be on them'; though the original allows us to render, 'Peace rests on them'. Peace in the soul, because of reconciliation with God. Peace with man through Him Who is 'our peace'. But mercy also, as needed by sinners.

and upon the Israel of God] Are 'the Israel of God' distinct from those who walk according to the Apostle's rule, or are we to regard the particle 'and' as epexegetical, and equivalent to 'yea, upon &c.'? The answer will depend on the exact meaning which is attached to the expression, 'the Israel of God'. If it means those 'who are not of the circumcision only, but who walk in the steps' of Abraham's faith, i.e. Jews who have been really converted to Christianity, we must suppose St Paul to have had Gentile converts in his mind in the preceding verses. It seems better, however, to regard the expression as intended From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus. Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

to sum up the 'as many as' in a phrase which is closely identified with the whole argument of the Epistle, 'If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise'. These are 'the Israel of God', whether Jews or Gentiles, for 'the Jew is he who is one inwardly in the spirit, not in the letter' Rom. ii. 29. So that the blessing is invoked on all who walk according to the rule enunciated, and so in fact on the true Israel, not Israel after the flesh, but the Israel of the promise and of God.

17. As at the opening, so at the close of the Epistle, St Paul asserts his authority. Then it was as a duly commissioned Apostle, here it is as a tried and tested servant of his Heavenly Master. He has fully discussed the question at issue. He has said his last word upon it. From henceforth he claims exemption from the worry and distraction of controversy. As he said elsewhere, 'If any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant' (1 Cor. xiv. 38).

For I bear...the Lord Jesus] All commentators agree in regarding this as having reference to St Paul's suffering for Christ. 'I, unlike these false teachers, can appeal to the marks of persecution which I have undergone as proofs of the depth of my convictions, the sincerity of my faith'. But the particular expression, 'the marks of the Lord Jesus', may either mean the 'wounds of Christ' or the marks of ownership branded on the Apostle's body, which proved him to be the 'slave of Christ'. Certain marks (stigmata) were affixed by means of a hot iron on two classes of slaves, (1) those who had run away from their masters or had otherwise misconducted themselves, in which case they were a badge of disgrace; and (2) on slaves attached to particular temples, as the property of the deity worshipped there. Of course St Paul cannot allude to the former of these cases. He may speak figuratively of the scars which he bore on his body, from wounds received at Lystra and elsewhere, as the proofs of his devotion to the service of Christ. Bp. Lightfoot adopts this view as most appropriate. "Such a practice at all events cannot have been unknown in a country which was the home of the worship of Cybele. A 'sacred slave' is mentioned in a Galatian inscription". There is however, something to be said for the other explanation which makes the marks of the Lord Jesus to be the wheal of the stripes inflicted on His sacred body—the print of the nails and of the spear. In confirmation of this view passages are adduced in which St Paul speaks of himself as a partaker of the sufferings of Christ, of bearing about in his body the dying of the Lord Jesus, of filling up in his flesh the sufferings of Christ, 2 Cor. i. 5, iv. 10; Col. i. 24; nay more, of being crucified with Christ, Rom. vi. 6; Gal. ii. 20. On the whole, however, the former account of the phrase seems preferable. Most modern expositors notice the alleged 'stigmata' of St Francis of Assisi. The connexion is limited to the identity of the term, which has been adopted by Romish hagiologists from the Latin Vulgate. The stigmata of the Saint were not marks of persecution.

18. The Epistle commenced with expostulation and rebuke. It closes with benediction. Grace is the key-note of the Apostle's argument. Grace—the Grace of the Lord Jesus Christ—the blessing he invokes on their behalf. It is the farewell prayer of a brother for his 'brethren', and it breathes the spirit of His Divine Master, of Whom we read, 'And it came to pass, while He blessed them, He was parted from them'.

Unto the Galatians...Rome] The Subscription in the earliest MSS. is simply, 'To Galatians'. The additional words 'written from Rome' appear first in a correction of the Vatican MS. of uncertain date, and in two of the later Uncials. It has been shewn in the Introduction that the statement, which rests on no sufficient authority, is clearly incorrect.
APPENDIX.

I.

ST PAUL’S VISIT TO ARABIA.

It may be well to consider this incident under the three heads indicated in the note to ch. i. 17. The notices are slight, and though insufficient to enable us to construct a narrative of the events with definiteness or with certainty, supply material for a probable and consistent account of them.

(1) The locality. The term Arabia has been taken by some commentators in its widest signification, as extending from the Sinaitic peninsula on the south to the neighbourhood of Damascus on the north; and expressions in Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. p. 305, A.) and Tertullian (Adv. Jud. c. 9; Adv. Marc. iii. 13) are adduced in support of this view. It is argued from the silence of St Luke (Acts ix. 19—25) that St Paul did not withdraw to any great distance from the city, so that though he actually went into Arabia for a time—how long, is not stated—he is regarded by the narrator as still at Damascus. The objections to this view are concisely stated by Bp Lightfoot. “It gives to ‘Arabia’ an extension, which at all events seems not to have been common, and which even the passage of Justin shews to have required some sort of justification. It separates the Arabia of the first chapters from the Arabia of the fourth. And lastly, it deprives this visit of a significance which, on a more probable hypothesis, it possesses in relation to this crisis of St Paul’s life.” By ‘Arabia’ then we understand (as in ch. iv. 25) the Sinaitic peninsula.

(2) The object. Of this two accounts are given. Patristic commentators suppose that St Paul went into Arabia, as the Apostle of the Gentiles, to commence his great missionary work. No doubt ‘Arabians’ were among those who were present at the great Pentecostal miracle (Acts ii. 11), and it may have been for the purpose of expounding unto them the way of God more perfectly that this journey was undertaken. But it is not likely that so marked a commencement of his labours as a missionary to the Gentiles would have been unrecorded by St Luke, especially as he is careful to tell us that St Paul “preached Christ in the synagogues”, and “how at Damascus he had preached boldly in the name of Jesus” (Acts ix. 20, 27).

If however we adopt the other explanation, and regard the object of St Paul’s visit as of a private and personal nature—that he might in solitude commune with his own heart and listen to the "still small voice" of God—then we can understand why, like Elijah of old, he should have journeyed 'unto Horeb, the mount of God'. There, on the very spot where the Law was given, he was taught the use of the Law—that "by the deeds of the Law no flesh shall be justified"; that while "the Law made nothing perfect", there was brought in "a better hope"; that "though the Law worketh wrath", "Christ hath redeemed us from the Curse of the Law, being made a Curse for us."

(3) The time. We do not know at what period of the 'three years' the journey was made, nor how long St Paul's sojourn in Arabia continued. St Luke's language is somewhat vague, but not at all inconsistent with the view here adopted. It is possible that after essaying to preach to the Jews in Damascus 'the faith which once he destroyed', St Paul found it needful to seek fresh supplies of grace and strength for a work so difficult and so discouraging. He may have heard his Master's call, bidding him 'come apart into a desert place, and rest awhile'. His stay in Horeb may have lasted, like that of Moses, for forty days and forty nights—the period of time spent by Elijah in his journey from Beer-sheba to Horeb, and by the great Antitype in the wilderness. These are, it is true, only conjectures. But while they are not inconsistent with the narrative of the Acts, they are in full accord with what we know of the nature and the needs of man, and with the dealings of God with the objects of His love and the instruments of His purposes. We may long for certainty. But where Scripture is silent, we are sure that more accurate knowledge is not needed, because it is not vouchsafed.

II.

The following is the summary referred to on ch. ii. 11—37:

"We take the record in its natural, historical sense, and derive from it the following instructive lessons:—

1. The right and duty of protest against ecclesiastical authority, even the highest, when Christian truth and principle are endangered. The protest should be manly, yet respectful. Paul was no doubt severe, but yet he recognised Peter expressly as a 'pillar' of the Church and a brother in Christ (Gal. i. 18, ii. 9). There was no personal bitterness and rudeness, as we find, alas, in the controversial writings of St Jerome (against Rufinus), St Bernard (against Abelard), Luther (against Erasmus and Zwingli), Bossuet (against Fenelon), and other great divines.

2. The duty to subordinate expediency to principle, the favour of man to the truth of God. Paul himself recommended and practised charity to the weak; but here a fundamental right, the freedom in Christ, was at stake, which Peter compromised by his conduct, after he himself had manfully stood up for the true principle at the Council of Jerusalem, and for the liberal practice at Antioch before the arrival of the Judaizers.
3. The moral imperfection of the Apostles. They remained even after the Pentecostal illumination frail human beings, carrying the heavenly treasure in earthen vessels, and stood in daily need of forgiveness (2 Cor. iv. 7; Phil. iii. 12; James iii. 2; 1 John i. 8, ii. 1). The weakness of Peter is here recorded, as his greater sin of denying his Lord is recorded in the Gospels, both for the warning and for the comfort of believers. If the chief of the Apostles was led astray, how much more should ordinary Christians be on their guard against temptation! But if Peter found remission, we may confidently expect the same on the same condition of hearty repentance. ‘The dissension—if dissension it could be called—between the two great Apostles will shock those only who, in defiance of all Scripture, persist in regarding the Apostles as specimens of supernatural perfection.’ (Farrar, Life and Work of St Paul, i. 444.)

4. The collision does not justify any unfavourable conclusion against the inspiration of the Apostles and the infallibility of their teaching. For Paul charges his colleague with hypocrisy or dissimulation, that is, with acting against his own better conviction. We have here a fault of conduct, a temporary inconsistency, not a permanent error of doctrine. A man may know and teach the truth, and yet go astray occasionally in practice. Peter had the right view of the relation of the gospel to the Gentiles ever since the conversion of Cornelius; he openly defended it at the Apostolic Council (Acts xv. 7; comp. Gal. ii. 1—9), and never renounced it in theory; on the contrary, his own Epistles agree fully with those of Paul, and are in part addressed to the same Galatians with a view to confirm them in their Pauline faith; but he suffered himself to be influenced by some scrupulous and contracted Jewish Christians from Jerusalem. By trying to please one party he offended the other, and endangered for a moment the sound doctrine itself.

5. The inconsistency here rebuked quite agrees with Peter’s character as it appears in the Gospels. The same impulsiveness and inconsistency of temper, the same mixture of boldness and timidity, made him the first to confess, and the first to deny Christ, the strongest and the weakest among the Twelve. He refused that Christ should wash his feet, and then by a sudden change he wished not his feet only, but his hands and head to be washed; he cut off the ear of Malchus, and in a few minutes afterwards he forsook his Master and fled; he solemnly promised to be faithful to Him, though all should forsake Him, and yet in the same night he denied Him thrice.

6. It should be remembered, however, on the other hand, first, that the question concerning the significance of the Mosaic law, and especially of the propriety of eating meat offered to idols, was a very difficult one, and continued to be agitated in the Apostolic Church (cf. 1 Cor. viii.—x.; Rom. xiv.). The decree of the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 20, 29), after all, stated simply the duties of the Gentile converts, strictly prohibiting them the use of meat offered to idols, but it said nothing on the duties of the Jewish Christians to the former, thus leaving some room for a milder and stricter view on the subject. We should also remember that the temptation on the occasion referred to was very great, since even Barnabas, the Gentile missionary, was overcome by it.

7. Much as we may deplore and censure the weakness of Peter and admire the boldness and consistency of Paul, the humility and meekness with which Peter, the oldest and most eminent of the twelve Apostles, seems to have borne the public rebuke of a younger colleague, are deserving of high praise. How touching is his subsequent allusion in 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16, which is addressed to the Galatians among others, to the very Epistles of his 'beloved brother Paul', in one of which his own conduct is so sharply condemned. This required a rare degree of Divine grace, which did its full work in him through much suffering and humiliation, as the humble, meek, gentle, and graceful spirit of his Epistles abundantly prove.

8. The conduct of Paul supplies a conclusive argument in favour of the equality of the Apostles and against the papal view of the supremacy of Peter. No pope would or could allow any Catholic bishop or archbishop to call him to an account and to talk to him in that style of manly independence. The conduct of Peter is also fatal to the claim of papal infallibility, as far as morals or discipline is concerned; for Peter acted here officially with all the power of his Apostolic example, and however correct in doctrine, he erred very seriously in practice, and endangered the great principle of Christian freedom, as the popes have done ever since. No wonder that the story was offensive to some of the Fathers and Roman commentators and gave rise to most unnatural explanations.

We may add that the account of the Council in Jerusalem in Acts xv. likewise contradicts the Vatican system, which would have required a reference of the great controversy on circumcision to the Apostle Peter rather than to a council under the presidency of James.

9. The Apostolic Church is typical, and foreshadows the whole course of the history of Christendom. Peter, Paul and John represent as many ages and phases of the Church. Peter is the rock of Catholicism, Paul the rock of evangelical Protestantism. Their temporary collision at Antioch anticipates the world-historical antagonism of Romanism and Protestantism, which continues to this day. It is an antagonism between legal bondage and evangelical freedom, between Judaizing conservatism and Christian progress. Let us hope also for a future reconciliation in the ideal Church of harmony and peace which is symbolized by John, the bosom friend of Christ, the seer of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Paul and Peter, as far as we know from the New Testament, never met again after this scene in Antioch. But ecclesiastical tradition reports that they were tried and condemned together in Rome, and executed on the same day (the 29th of June). Peter, the Galilæan disciple, on the hill of the Janiculum, where he was crucified; Paul, the Roman citizen, on the Ostian road at the Tre Fontane, where he was beheaded. Their martyr blood thus mingled is still a fountain of life to the church of God.”—Abridged from Dr Schaff’s Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians.
The Revised Version renders, 'knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, save through faith in Jesus Christ', giving in the margin 'but only', as an alternative of 'save'. Alford translates 'ex­cept'. Though a full discussion of the use of the Greek particles here employed is beyond the scope of this work, yet the question involved is of such momentous issues, that the correct rendering of the passage must be not only stated, but maintained. Two particles, of which the literal English equivalent is 'if not', occur in combination about 150 times in the New Testament. In the large majority of passages in which they are found, there can be no difference of opinion as to their force or proper translation, viz. 'if not', 'unless', 'except'. In a few passages, however, it is impossible to adopt one of these renderings without sacrificing either sense or truth, and reducing the statement to an absurdity. To the instances quoted in the note on ch. i. 19 (Luke iv. 26, 27, where the A.V. is of course wrong), may be added Matt. xii.
4, and Rev. xxi. 7, where it is right in rendering 'but only' and 'but'. It may be observed that the question is not whether these particles ever lose their exceptive force (see Bp Lightfoot, note on ch. i.
19, and Prof. Scholefield, Preface to 3rd edition of Sermons on Justification by Faith, pp. 35—37). Nor again is it here necessary to explain the refinements of Greek idiom by reference to the subtleties of Greek thought. The transition from the exceptive, 'save', to the exclusive, 'but only', is in certain passages undoubted and may be logically deduced. It is clear that for the purposes of correct translation (i.e. if we would convey to an English reader the true sense of the original), we must employ 'but', or 'but only' in certain passages as the equivalent of particles which are elsewhere rendered by 'save' or 'except'.
It remains to determine which is the just rendering in the passage under consideration. Now, if words have any meaning, the R.V. (which is ex hypothesis a correction of the A.V.) teaches what has been termed "a mixed justification by faith and works", the efficacy of works for justification being conditional on the addition or admixture of faith.
This, however, is in direct contradiction of what immediately follows—
"we believed Christ that we might be justified by faith in Christ and not by the works of the law". Had the Apostle allowed works any place as a ground of the justification of a sinner, he would either have omitted the last clause or have written, "and (or, together with) the works of the law". But this would have been to contradict his plainest assertions in another Epistle. In Rom. iii. 21 we read, "But now apart from law the righteousness of God has been manifested, even the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe"; and, v. 28, "We reckon then that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law (perhaps, works of law, i.e. acts of obedience to any law, ceremonial or moral)". Compare Rom. iv. 4—6.
In all these passages St Paul uses an adverb which means 'apart from', independently of, rather than 'without'. The sinner is justified through faith only, apart from any works of his own. Christ's fulfilment of the law—His perfect obedience and His atoning death—needs not and admits not any supplement on the part of the sinner to satisfy the righteousness of God. We who believe 'are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservedings', Art. xi. But though 'the works of the law' have absolutely no part in our justification, because the faith through which we are justified is 'apart from' them, yet St Paul nowhere asserts that we are justified without works. That would be sheer antinomianism. Good works are 'the fruits of faith', and 'by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit', Art. xii. For a further illustration of St Paul's teaching on the relation of faith and works, compare Eph. ii. 8—10, and for his doctrine of justification by faith 'apart from' works, Phil. iii. 9.

It is certain then, that the true rendering is, 'not justified by the works of the law, but (or, but only) through faith in Jesus Christ.'

IV.

ON THE FAITH OF ABRAHAM.

No one can read the Epistle to the Galatians attentively and dispassionately without being struck by the manner in which St Paul refers to the Old Testament Scriptures. It is not merely that he recognises and defers to their authority. He assumes that the Gospel of Jesus Christ was not a new Revelation, but the crowning stage in a progressive development of the Divine purposes of mercy to man, of which the germ was the promise made to Eve that her Seed should bruise the serpent's head1. On the part of God this development, though continuous, was not uniform2. But as regards man, the terms and conditions of acceptance were the same. Death had entered into the world by sin. The promise (nay, the command) repeated all through the ages, now in words expressly, now by type and ceremonial, was one and the same, 'Believe and live.' There is no exception in the command, Divine as it was, 'Do this and thou shalt live.' Repeated by our Lord Himself3, it was not propounded as a Gospel: but, like the Law, designed to convince of sin, and so to drive men back on the Gospel, to 'shut them up'4 to accept God's mercy on God's own terms.

But while the universality of this principle of faith is admitted, it may seem that the object, and so the quality of faith is different in the case of Abraham and others who lived under the old dispensation from that which is exercised by Christians. To the latter the command is, 'Be-

2 God had spoken to the fathers by the prophets from Moses onwards 'in sundry portions and in divers manners,' Heb. i. 1.
3 Luke x. 28.
4 Gal. iii. 23.
It might seem that to the former the object of faith was not the same. In the case of many of the heroes of faith, of whom we have a list in the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, there is no reference to any belief in a Saviour from sin, much less to faith in Jesus Christ of Nazareth. To this objection it may be sufficient to reply that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews is not speaking of justifying faith, but of faith generally, trust in the unseen, of which it is the text, and so to the individual the proof or conviction of things not seen. This faith was the mainspring of the religious life and action of the elders.

But as regards Abraham, at any rate, although the promise (Gen. xv. 5) might seem to be only temporal—the promise of a posterity countless as the stars of heaven—yet it contained in it the promise of Christ. It must be borne in mind that Abraham had already exercised faith in the word and promise of God (Gen. xii. 1–4, 7, 8, xiii. 14–18, xv. 1). But at length a special demand is made upon his faith: God sees fit on a particular occasion and in a special form to renew to him the promise, preceded by the assurance, 'Fear not Abraham, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward.' And when the promise was given, the patriarch 'believed the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness.' With what degree of clearness Abraham was permitted to foresee the future Reconciler, by whom and in whom alone God is reconciled to man and man to God, we know not. But we have our Lord's own declaration, 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad.'

V.

Of the many explanations which have been given of this passage a few of the most important may be noticed. They may be classified in three divisions, according to the supposed reference in the term Mediator:

1. The earlier expositors understood the term Mediator in the passage before us to refer to Christ. In favour of this view it may of course be urged that in all other passages of the N. T. (see note on v. 19) where the word occurs it refers to our Lord Jesus Christ. But it no more follows that the word thus applied to our Lord so loses its...

\(^{1}\) See Bp. Westcott on Heb. xi. 1: "The writer first marks the characteristics of Faith generally (v. 1) and its application to the elementary conceptions of religion (v. 3, comp. v. 6). He then shows that the spiritual history of the world is a history of the victories of Faith. This is indicated by the fragmentary records of the old world (4–7), and more particularly by the records of the growth of the Divine Society (the Church). This was founded in the Faith of obedience and patience of the patriarchs (6–16); and built up in the Faith of sacrifice, sustained against natural judgment (17–25); and carried to victory by the Faith of conquest (23–31). . . . All these preliminary victories of Faith await their consummation from the Faith of Christians (39, 40)." primary meaning as to be appropriated exclusively to Him, than that the words 'shepherd' and 'bishop' must necessarily refer to Him in every passage where they occur, because He is 'the Shepherd and Bishop' of our souls. Even if the reference to Christ could be established as a simple and natural explanation of the passage, taken by itself, the connexion with the context is obscured or lost, and the force of the Apostle's argument impaired thereby.

2. More probable is the opinion that in v. 20, as in v. 19, the Mediator is Moses. (The definite article in the Greek may lend equal support to this and to the next explanation.) This opinion, entertained by eminent commentators, both ancient and modern, is in full accord with the scope of the passage. But the reference, though suggested by, is not therefore limited to the giving of the Law. 'The mediator,' just spoken of (v. 19), is undoubtedly Moses, but what was true of him in that capacity is also true of every other human mediator.

3. Lastly, we may regard the first portion of the verse as laying down a general proposition. Those who hold this view adopt the rendering of the English Bible, both A.V. and R.V. alike, as correct, and understand it to express 'the idea, the specific type,' and to state a characteristic of the Mediator, as such. The very idea of mediation implies a transaction involving the existence of at least two parties, and mutual conditions. But the Gospel is a promise, the gift of grace. God alone is its author, and its fulfilment depends on His faithfulness—on Himself alone.

Under each of these general divisions (especially the last) a great many explanations, differing in some particulars, are found. Many of these, so far from being destructive of one another, are not inconsistent or irreconcilable with one another. The slighter differences help to illustrate and confirm the great truth which St Paul is enforcing, rather than to obscure his meaning or render it uncertain. A more detailed account of these, with the names of their principal authors, may be found in Dr Schaffe's Commentary, Excursus, p. 38, who gives the following extract from Reuss's French Commentary, which clearly expresses one, and perhaps the best-supported, view of the passage under consideration: "A mediator implies two contracting parties, consequently two wills, which may be united, but may also disagree; a law therefore given by mediation is conditional and imperfect: but the promise, emanating from God alone, and having His will for its sole source and guarantee, is infinitely more sure and more elevated. The law, then, cannot set aside the promise, its aim can only be secondary."

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON CH. ii. 20.

This verse strikes the key-note of the Epistle, and is a summary of the whole Christian revelation subjectively considered. St Paul here discloses to our view the secret of his life as a Christian and as an Apostle, the mainspring of his wonderful activity, the source and the object of the enthusiasm by which he was inspired. We know something of his life and his labours. Here he tells us how that life was lived, and why those labours were undergone. A full record of his teaching has been preserved to us. Here is a summary of it all.

A comparison of two other passages of the N. T. will serve to throw light on this verse. In Eph. ii. 4 St Paul speaks of that 'great love wherewith God loved us, and even when we were dead in sins quickened us together with Christ'. In Rev. i. 5 St John ascribes praise 'to Him that loveth us and released us from our sins in His own blood'. In the former of these passages, the love displayed is that of God the Father. Here it is the Lord Jesus Christ who loved the Apostle. In the latter passage, the love of Christ is regarded as still exercised, unchanged, towards those who are its objects. (Comp. John xiii. 1.) But in both passages it is the love of the Church collectively, not of the individual Christian, which is affirmed. In the verse before us St Paul appropriates this love. His language is intensely personal. 'Who loved me'. He claims as his own the assurance made long before to the prophet Jeremiah (ch. xxxi. 3), 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love'. Of this love the proof and pledge was the great Sacrifice of the Cross. He 'gave Himself for me'. There is no boasting here, save that which the Apostle avows when he says (Gal. vi. 14) 'God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ'. Such boasting is the confidence of true humility, the faith which constitutes personal Christianity.

1 This love of God is 'in Christ Jesus our Lord'. Rom. viii. 39. Comp. v. 35.
2 The present tense, 'loveth us', has the support of the best MSS., and is adopted in the R. V.
