immediately observed. He then called upon his friend with an invitation to visit him, which was readily responded to, and on his arrival he was shown into the study. It happened exactly as Kircher had planned. His friend no sooner observed it than he inquired whence it had come and with an invitation to visit him, which was readily responded to, and on his arrival he was shown into the study.

-----··--·-~-----·-~-- --------~----------

by anyone, but came golden opportunity, and he promptly and wisely availed himself of it.

22 THE Kircher, 'that it belongs to no one, that it was never made to whom it belonged.

John the atheist, 'is impossible; you jest.' This was Kircher's his former sceptics, he gladly united with all who contend that those vast heavenly bodies, of which this is but a faint dimimive resemblance, came into existence without either order, design, or a creation!' His friend was first confounded, then convinced, and ultimately abandoning all his former scepticisms, he gladly united with all who reverence and love God in acknowledging the glory and adoring the majesty of the great Creator of the heavens and earth and all their host.—W. M. TAYLOR.

There is a remarkable sentence or two in the preface to John Wesley's first volume of sermons, in which that great evangelist gives us the secret of his method of Bible-study, 'Here am I,' he says, 'far from the busy ways of men. I sit down alone; only God is here. In His presence I open, I read His Book; for this end, to find the way to heaven. Does anything appear dark or intricate? I lift my heart to the Father of Lights. I then search after and consider parallel passages of Scripture, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. I meditate thereon with all the attention and earnestness of which my mind is capable. And what I thus learn, that I teach.' To Wesley, then, there were two great realities—the visible Book, and its invisible but ever-present Author; and to a man of his training and spiritual susceptibilities the one would have been a perfect enigma without the other. He saw God at the beginning of every section of Holy Scripture.—W. MIDDLETON.

Sermons for Reference.

Alford (H.), Quebec Chapel Sermons, iv. 1.
Bacon (L. W.), Simplicity that is in Christ, 196.
Brookes (Stopford A.), Sermons, i. 222.
Cумming (J.), Church before the Flood, 79.
Difficulties of the Bible, 503.
How (W. W.), Plain Words, ii. 59.
Hutchings (W. H.), Sermon Sketches, 54.
Kingsley (C.), Discipline, 112.
Gospel of the Pentateuch, 1.
Leach (S.), Truth and Life, 1.
Liddon (H. F.), Sermons from Penny Pulpit, i. 205.
University Sermons, ii. 38.
Lockyer (T. F.), Inspirations of the Christian Life, 1.
Magoc (W. C.), Sermons (Contemp. Pulp. Lib.), 26.
Meyer (F. B.), Calvary to Pentecost, 79.
Middleton (W.), Alpha and Omega, 15.
Oosterzee (J. J. van), Year of Salvation, ii. 320.
Parker (J.), People's Bible, l. 49, 118.
Pearse (M. G.), Aspects of Blessed Life, 17.
Roberson (F. W.), Notes on Genesis, 1.
Soden (J. J.), Sermons on Social Subjects, 1.
Swiny (D.), Sermons, 195.
Vaughan (J.), Sermons, xv. 37.

The Historical Background of the Epistle to the Philippians.

Considerable vagueness has prevailed as to the order in which 'Philippians' stands among the Epistles of the Captivity. Lightfoot and Hort have lent the weight of their authority to the opinion which would place it first in the series. Meyer, Weiss, Lipsius, Hoitzmann, and others are equally decided in assigning it to the last place. We do not intend at present to examine the arguments on either side. We wish rather to discover as clearly as possible what the Epistle itself has to say of the circumstances in which it was written, of the historical background which lies behind it. We believe that the situation is to be gathered rather from a few casual hints than from any direct statement.

It is admitted on all hands that the undertone of the whole Epistle is joy, a hopeful joy, which is only now and then overshadowed by a more sober mood. Now this joy is by no means accidental. It comes persistently into view. Nothing is allowed to mar it. Is it not, then, Paul's deliberate intention to write to the Philippians in a cheerful tone, and must not this be done with the express purpose of correcting some erroneous impressions which they had formed? From the personal nature of the joy which he emphasizes, these ererroneous impressions probably related to himself. Indeed this is made almost certain by 112: τὰ κατ’ εἰμὶ μᾶλλον εἰς προκοπὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἡμῶν, ἡμᾶς προκοπή προκοπή. My circumstances have fallen out rather unto the progress of the gospel. μᾶλλον shows that their anticipations had been deceived. Not only had his affairs not turned out unfavourably, as they feared, but, on the contrary, to the advantage of the gospel and of him, his preacher.

What were the circumstances in Paul's experience which they dreaded? These can only be pieced together from informal references in the Epistle. In 117 he tells them that he thinks of them as sharers with him in the grace of God: ἐὰν τοις δεσμοῖς μου καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀπολογίᾳ και βεβαιώσει τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, 'Both in my imprisonment and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel.' We believe that here he is speaking, not metaphorically, but with definite facts before his mind. He is a prisoner. But he has been in that condition for long. There has been a further development of the situation. The protracted delay in the hearing of his case (Ac 28:30: εἰς ἡμᾶς δομινόν μου ἐν δόλῳ μωσθόμεν, 'He abode two whole years in his own hired dwelling,' R.V.) has come to an end. His ἀπολογία has begun. Of course this ἀπολογία is at the same time a defence of the gospel. Nay. His appearance in the Roman court of justice is something more. It is a βεβαιώσει of the gospel. ἐβεβαίωσε was a technical legal term, equivalent to the Latin auctoritas or evictio (see Deissmann, Briefstudien, p. 100 ff.). It signified the guarantee which the seller in a transaction gave to the purchaser against any claims that might be laid to the object purchased. Paul's presence before the Roman magistrates is a guarantee for the gospel.

Now we begin to see some light on the Philippians' anxiety. So long as Paul lived in his own lodging, although a prisoner technically, he was, to all intents and purposes, a free man. But now the final issue has come. The necessary documents have been handed in from the lower court. Probably this process has caused the delay. Everything will henceforth turn on the decision of the higher tribunal. Paul is now a prisoner in reality, perhaps removed to one of the gloomy State-prisons as soon as a time has been fixed for the hearing of his case. No wonder the hearts of his loyal Philippian converts are filled with dark forebodings.

How, then, in so critical a situation, can the apostle write with such exuberant joy, what reason has he for such high spirits? No doubt he has learnt, as he tells the Philippians (413), to be content in any circumstances. But plainly, from 118, his affairs have taken a favourable turn. Will not this be closely connected with the hearing of his case? Must it not be that his judges are already discovering that the accusation brought against him is a sham: that he is not a leader of sedition, dangerous to society, but simply a religious enthusiast who has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds? He is recognized, he says, to be a prisoner for Christ's sake (118: τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου φωνεῖται ἐν Χριστῷ γενόσθαι: 'My bonds have become manifest in Christ'). This recognition takes place ἐν δόλῳ τῷ πρατερωτίῳ. These words are usually taken to mean either 'among the whole pretorian guard' (so, e.g. Lightfoot, Hofmann, Haupt), or 'throughout the barracks of the guard' (so, e.g. Alford, Lipsius, Klopper, von Soden). And good arguments can be used to support these interpretations, more especially the first mentioned. But a new and most suggestive explanation has been proposed by Professor Mommsen, the greatest living authority on Roman history. In the Sitz.-Berichte of the Berlin Academy, 30th May 1895 (p. 498 ff.), he observes that by this time the emperor's delegates for hearing such appeals as that of Paul were the prefecti pretorio. Accordingly he takes the words before us to mean the judicial authorities as a whole, the prefecti pretorio, with their numerous assistants and subordinates. The sympathy which Paul found in these official circles is corroborated, he believes, by the greetings sent (429) from those ἐκ τῆς Kaisaropos oríxas. This striking explanation, it may be said, has been warmly advocated by Professor W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357). One cannot help feeling that these various facts, grouped together, shed a clear light on the whole situation. Paul may well feel hopeful, for already his Christian brethren have become emboldened by the turn which affairs have taken (119). We need not wonder that in 119 he declares his conviction that his present situation ὁμοιοῦσθαι ὑπὲρ τῆς σωτηρίας, 'Will result in my deliverance.' This is the meaning assigned to σωτηρία by the great Greek expositors, Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret. The words are a quotation from Job 13:16 (LXX). There it is a judicial process that is in view, and the word means victory in the struggle for right. His contest has begun. He hopes that in nothing will he be put to shame (ἐναντίον, probably by denying Christ or failing to set forth His claims in the best light), but that at this very time (καὶ νῦν, his trial) Christ may be glorified in his person, whether by life or death (for, of course, he cannot be certain of release. Despotic tribunals were notoriously arbitrary). Still he feels justified in believing that a happy prospect awaits him in this life. It is not going beyond probability to speak (1:26) of his ἀνείρησαν τὸ πρός ὑμᾶς (‘presence again with you’), or to express his confidence (2:24) that he will soon visit them.

There is every reason to believe that Paul’s expectation was realized (see Harnack, Chronologie, pp. 238–239). If the foregoing brief discussion have any validity, we can the more easily picture the actual facts on which that expectation was based; we are able more clearly to grasp the historical background of the whole situation. Plainly, this favours the hypothesis that ‘Philippians’ is the latest of the Imprisonment-Epistles.¹

¹ After arriving at the above conclusions, we have been gratified to find that the same general view of the situation, supported by many of the same arguments, has been taken by Zahn, Eingieitung in d. N. T., Bd. i. pp. 380–382, 391–392. He rejects, however, Mommsen’s explanation of παρέχομαι.

Recent Foreign Theology.

Sennacherib and Sargon.

Dr. Lehmann’s handsomely printed book,¹ though addressed to the specialist in Assyro-Babylonian history, ought to interest Old Testament scholars as well. The two problems which he sets himself to solve are: (1) the apparent discrepancy between the date given by Sennacherib, at Bavian, for the reign of Tiglath-pileser i. and other chronological records that have come to us; and (2) the vast antiquity assigned by Nabonidos to Sargon of Akkad and his son Naram-Sin. His book deals very exhaustively with these two questions, and brings together all the materials for settling them which were known up to the date of its publication. Among them the so-called Dynastic Tablet naturally occupies a prominent place. This is a tablet discovered by Mr. Pinches, which, though unfortunately mutilated, gives us the names of the Babylonian kings from the ‘First Dynasty of Babylon’ onward, arranged in dynasties, and with the length of each reign attached. Had the tablet been complete we should have had an exact chronology—at all events, as it was conceived by the native historians—from the foundation of the dynasty to which Khammurabi or Amraphel belonged.

The tablet is badly written, and, consequently, difficult of decipherment, even where it has not been injured or destroyed. Dr. Lehmann has made a careful examination of the numerical ciphers contained in it, and has thus been able to correct some of those given in the published copies of the text. In certain cases, however, the actual cipher must remain doubtful until a duplicate of the inscription can be found. But there is one point of chronological importance which may be considered as settled; the fourth dynasty (of Isin) lasted 132 years, and not 62 years as was at first supposed.

But before problems can be solved they must first exist; and that Dr. Lehmann’s problems have any real existence seems to me more than questionable. Frankly, I do not believe in them, in spite of all the learning and historical acumen displayed in his book. Let us first take his second problem, that of the antiquity of the date (3800 B.C.) assigned to Sargon of Akkad.

Dr. Lehmann’s difficulty here does not lie in the remoteness of the date, but in the fact that between the era of Sargon and that of the second dynasty of Ur, a period of a thousand years according to Nabonidos, no dated Babylonian monuments have been discovered. Hence Dr. Lehmann concludes that the interval in question had no existence. But it is dangerous to argue from the imperfection of our knowledge, more