INTERPRETIVE CHALLENGES RELATING TO HABAKKUK 2:4b

GEORGE J. ZEMEK, JR.

The worthy reputation of Hab 2:4b in both Jewish and Christian circles is well attested. For example, "the Talmud records the famous remark of R. Simlai (Makot 23b), 'Moses gave Israel 613 commandments. David reduced them to 10, Isaiah to 2, but Habakkuk to one: the righteous shall live by his faith.'"¹ New Testament theology is also built upon that text's firm foundation. Concerning Paul’s utilization, Johnson appropriately asserts: "'The just shall live by faith,' — it is, without question, near the soul of Pauline theology."² Historically, the testimony of the text as a theological benchmark continued to grow. The preeminent illustration of this phenomenon was the text’s catalytic effect in leading to the Reformation: "Habakkuk's great text, with his son Paul's comments and additions, became the banner of the Protestant Reformation in the hands of Habakkuk’s grandson, Martin Luther."³ Consequently, Feinberg's appraisal of Hab 2:4b should not be regarded as an overstatement: "The key to the whole Book of Habakkuk ... the central theme of all the Scriptures."⁴

In spite of this reputation, the text has occasioned many critical investigations. These studies range from those immediately associated with the text to those which are tangential; in terms of result, they range from those which are destructive to those which are constructive. This endeavor is intended to be a general survey of the most significant challenges relating to Hab 2:4b.

Since the text is particularly strategic, every conservative student of the Word of God has the theological responsibility of sharpening his focus on the tensions manifested by these studies. Also, this responsibility cannot be avoided merely because an ultimate resolution of all the tensions is improbable.\(^5\)

*The author would like to thank Mr. William D. Barrick for his labors in reference to the revision of the format of this paper for publication.

³Ibid., 328.

The occasion of these tensions is related primarily to the “textual, hermeneutical, exegetical, and theological problems raised by the use of Hab 2:4 in the New Testament.”\(^6\) A corollary to this central concern is the alleged Paul/James antithesis between faith and works. However, when all the scriptural data is synthesized, the arguments are found to be complementary, and a biblically balanced approach emerges.\(^7\)

A larger, concentric corollary involves the scriptural data which may be systematized within the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. Larger yet is the concentric corollary of divine sovereignty and human responsibility. In all of these cases and from the reference point of an exegetical, systematic theology, the issues are not illuminated by an either/or methodology but by a both/and sensitivity. The key word of biblical and systematic studies in theology must be “balance.”

INTERNAL CHALLENGES

It is expedient to examine the text of Hab 2:4b first. There are at least two good reasons for this tack: textual variants are minimal, and consequently, the line becomes a poetical reference point which provides important clues concerning the interpretation of the more difficult lines within the immediate context.\(^8\)

Textual considerations\(^9\)

The major textual problem concerns the third masculine singular suffix attached to ἡμαρξ. Brownlee summarizes the pertinent data:

\(^5\)Concerning a tangentially but yet vitally related discussion on the significance of the genitive θεοῦ in the phrase δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ within its context (i.e., Rom 1:17a; cf. Hab 2:4b quotation in Rom 1:17b), Cranfield honestly concludes that “the last word in this debate has clearly not yet been spoken. It would therefore be irresponsible to claim that the question has been conclusively decided either way” [italics added]. C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975), 1. 98-99. The extended discussion of this problem by Cranfield represents only one facet of the tension related to the present study.

\(^7\)Cranfield carefully describes the Protestant/Catholic tensions over δικαιοσύνη. His recognition of both distinction and concord with regard to justification and sanctification is noteworthy. Cranfield, Romans, 1. 95.

Instead of \( \text{טָמַנְתָּ֔נָה} \) in Hab. 2:4, G, Aq., and Old Latin read \( \text{טָמַנְתָּ֔נָה} \). It is no loss that the word in vii. 15 [i.e. 1QpHab] is no longer extant, for in the script of the scroll 1 and 4 could not have been distinguished. The interpretation \( \text{טָמַנְתָּ֔נָה} \) ("their faith") at viii. 2, however, fortunately confirms the 3rd per. suffix. T's \( \text{קְרֵשְׁתָּ֔נָה} \) interprets also the 3rd sing. suffix — the plural number being merely a part of the translator's free representation of the thought. The Palestinian recension reads \( \text{נֵי} \, \text{נֵי} \) with MT against G's \( \text{יְסָטְרֵךְ} \). In the N.T. neither suffix is attested (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38), but the interpretation is consonant with the 3rd pers.\(^{10}\)

Semantic considerations pertaining to \( \text{טיַנְתָּ֔נָה} \)

1. General considerations. With the introduction of the semantics of the \( \text{טיַנְתָּ֔נָה} \) words, the battle for balance in this study commences. To a greater or lesser degree, every scholar's presuppositions color his interpretation of the data. Generally speaking, Hill's treatment demonstrates commendable balance. Dodd's treatment is based upon a legitimate footing; however, at times, he becomes eccentric to the right. His footing is worthy of citation:

It is evident that this study of the Greek renderings of \( \text{טיַנְתָּ֔נָה} \) has an important bearing upon the uses of \( \text{דְּקַיְוֹסִיּוֹנָ} \), \( \text{דָּקַיְוֹסִיּוֹנָ} \) in the New Testament. In particular, the Pauline use of these terms must be understood in the light of Septuagintal usage and the underlying Hebrew. The apostle wrote Greek, and read the LXX, but he was also familiar with the Hebrew original. Thus while his language largely follows that of the LXX, the Greek words are for him always coloured by their Hebrew association.\(^{12}\)

---

\(^{10}\) W. H. Brownlee, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran (JBLMS 11; Philadelphia: Society of Biblical Literature, 1959) 44-45. Concerning the \( \mu \nu \) of the LXX, it "could mean either 'because of my [sc. God's] faithfulness' or 'because of his faith in me.'" Cranfield, Romans, 1. 100. It is obvious that the active and passive options of \( \pi ṿ \tau \)s contribute to this ambivalence. For further comment on the diversity of the possessive pronouns in Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, see: J. Eadie, A Commentary on the Greek Text of the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1869) 244.

\(^{12}\) For an excellent discussion of the root \( \text{טיַנְתָּ֔נָה} \), with generally credible syntheses, see: D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms (SNTSMS 5; Cambridge: Cambridge University, 1967) 82-162 [i.e., chap. 4, "The Background and Meaning of \( \Delta \text{ＩΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ} \) and Cognate Words"]; note especially pp. 82-98.
It will be seen that Barr's slightly left-of-center polemic will help to check indiscriminate extensions of the aforementioned principle, regardless of the specific words involved (e.g., הַרְשָׁדָה, הָיָּשֵׁר, etc.).

After an etymological survey of the root הָיָּשֵׁר (cf. Ugaritic, Phoenician, and Arabic), Hill concludes:

On the basis of these illustrations of early usage it is difficult to assert with confidence a single primary meaning of the root הָיָּשֵׁר. The most we can say is that they suggest that the fundamental idea of הָיָּשֵׁר available to us is that of conformity to a norm which requires to be defined in each particular case.

Turning to the Old Testament, it is first necessary to note that there is a "two-fold application of the הָיָּשֵׁר-terms": "The application of הָיָּשֵׁר-words to Yahweh" and "the application of the הָיָּשֵׁר-words to Israel and to the individual."

Cranfield's survey adequately presents the most significant data and exposes the judicial and ethical subcategories:

Where se'dek is used in connexion with the conduct of persons, it refers to the fulfillment of the obligations arising from a particular situation, the demands of a particular relationship. As far as Israel was concerned the supremely important relationship was the covenant between God and His people; and se'dek in the OT is to be understood in the context of the Covenant. The adjective Saddik is used to describe those whose conduct and character, whether specifically in relation to the administration of justice or quite generally, are characterized by se'dek. But [italics added] there are passages in which Saddik used of Israel or of the individual Israelite, refers to status rather than to ethical condition (see, for example, Ps. 32:11 in the light of vv. 1, 2 and 5; Isa. 60:21). The cognate verb used in the Qal, can mean (i) "be just," "be righteous" (e.g. Job 35:7; Ps. 19:9 [MT:10]; 51:4 [MT:6]); (ii) "be in the right" in the sense of having a just cause (e.g. Gen. 38:26); (iii) "be justified," "be declared righteous" (e.g. Ps. 143:2; Isa. 43:26). In the Hiph'il (and occasionally in the Piel), it means "justify," "declare righteous," "acquit" (e.g. Exod. 23:7; Deut. 25:1; Prov. 17:15): there is also one place (Dan. 12:3), where the Hiph'il seems to mean "make righteous," "turn to righteousness."
The existence of an ethical sense in some occurrences of קְדוֹשׁ in the Old Testament must not be disputed: "On many occasions . . . the 'righteous' are those who, in humility and faithfulness, trust in Yahweh, despite persecution and oppression: those who seek to live uprightly and without pride of heart, depending on Yahweh for protection and vindication."\textsuperscript{18} However, the question remains whether it is valid to categorize קְדוֹשׁ in Hab 2:4b as "just, righteous, in conduct and character . . . towards God."\textsuperscript{19}

2. קְדוֹשׁ in Genesis 15:6. As previously intimated, the judicial implications concerning the nature of any man who is designated קְדוֹשׁ are not always given due credence. To Habakkuk or any godly Jew, the background of God's dealings with Abraham would be foundational: "Then he [i.e., Abraham] believed [בָּלַה בְּאִלֶּחֶם] in the LORD; and He reckoned it to him as righteousness [קְדוֹשׁ לְאִישׁ]" (Gen 15:6).\textsuperscript{20} Of particular significance to this study is the observation that the roots of the two key words of Hab 2:4b (i.e., קְדוֹשׁ and קְדָשָׁה) are associated in this important verse from the Pentateuch. Also related to this judicial phenomenon is the delocutive employment of the Hiphil of קְדָשָׁה (i.e., קְדֶשֶׁה, to "prone in the right," "justify").\textsuperscript{21} These observations are germane to a balanced understanding of קְדוֹשׁ (and קְדָשָׁה) in Hab 2:4b.

Gowan believes that the term has a judicial nuance, based upon the occurrence of קְדוֹשׁ in antithetical contexts: "The word . . . is used in a situation of controversy and contrast, to denote those whom God favors."\textsuperscript{22} This argument does favor a non-ethical employment of קְדוֹשׁ in Hab 2:4b, but it presents a slightly different perspective, one which cannot be ignored in the light of the larger context:

\textsuperscript{18}Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, 94. Hill's discussion of the ethical usages of קְדוֹשׁ is excellent. He points out that such usages are inextricably related to the attributes of the Lord associated with the קְדֶשֶׁה-group of words [cf. the same phenomenon in reference to the קְדֶשֶׁה-group] (ibid., 92). Furthermore, "the suggested threefold development in the history of the קְדֶשֶׁה-words may be of guidance in the understanding and interpretation of other religious and theological terms. This development takes the word from an association with man and his life (in this case, the 'righteousness' of the king) to an association with Yahweh, and back again to man, with a richer content and colour drawn from its relation to deity" (ibid., 97).

\textsuperscript{19}BDB 843. For an extended development of this ethical category, see: Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 42ff.

\textsuperscript{22}Gowan, The Triumph of Faith in Habakkuk, 42. It is fair to assume, however, that Gowan's thesis and conclusion concerning קְדוֹשׁ in Hab 2:4b have been affected to a degree by his desire to demonstrate an antithetical substantive in הֵ/LICENSE (2:4a). Ibid.
The just (Hebrew, tsaddîk), the righteous one, is the one who has been vindicated, whom God has declared to be right. There is a legal background to this word; it denotes the winner in a case at law in some of its Old Testament uses. So it is not restricted in its reference to a purely internal quality of goodness which one may possess. It is used in situations of controversy to denote the side which is right. Its opposite is wicked (Hebrew, rasha'), and we saw the two words paired in 1:4 and 1:13 [italics added].

3. The Greek renderings. An important generalization is noted by Dodd:

Where the Hebrew conception of righteousness differs from the popular Greek conception we may put it thus, that whereas for the Greek δίκαιος is always being pulled over from the broad sense of "righteousness" to the narrower sense of "justice," the pull in Hebrew is in the opposite direction.

In the light of this, it is obvious that the Septuagint’s renderings of the ἸΣΑγιωτατ-words modified the δίκαιος words. These changes primarily reflect divine and covenantal influences found in the Hebrew word. NT usages basically follow this pattern:

That Paul’s use of the words δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη and δικαιούν (and also of δικαιώμα and δικαιώσις) reflects his familiarity with, and is to a very considerable extent molded by, the LXX use of them to render words of the ṣdq group is clear, and is generally agreed. . . . But, in spite of the general agreement on the importance of the LXX here, there is far from being general agreement as to the precise significance which these words have in Paul.

Ironically, it would seem that these observations and clarifications magnify the interpretive challenges relating to Hab 2:4b.

Semantic considerations pertaining to ἸΣΑ:

This kind of life must be understood within its biblical framework:

To live is not merely to exist, in Hebrew thought. One is not really alive when sick, weak, in danger or with a damaged reputation. To be alive is to have vigor, security and honor. So this verse does not merely tell us how we can barely hang on to some feeble thread of existence in 23Ibid., 41.

24See: Hill, “δίκαιος and Related Words in Greek Usage,” in Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, 98ff.
25Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 45. For specific comparisons and contrasts, see: Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, 102-3.
26Cranfield, Romans, 1. 95. Concerning the verb (i.e., δικαιοῦν), he especially notes that “none of the occurrences . . . can be at all tolerably explained on the basis of the word’s use in secular Greek.” Ibid.
times such as Habakkuk describes; no, it speaks of being richly and fully alive. That interpretation is confirmed by 3:17-18. 27

Hill corroborates this interpretation, but with an ethical emphasis:

Man’s life, however, is more than simply length of days and abundance of possessions: it consists rather in what he is by virtue of his goals and ideals. . . . The pessimistic outlook which characterizes Ecclesiastes focuses attention on enjoyment, but in Proverbs the ideal is the good life, the life of righteousness. “In the paths of righteousness is life” (Prov. 12:28; cf. 11:19; 10:16); wisdom is the source and means of life (3:2; 8:35), and the fear of the Lord leads to life (19:23). . . . We recall the utterance of Deut. 8:3, “Man lives (יְחיֶהָ) by everything which proceeds from the mouth of the Lord” . . . Only by faithfulness, that is, by loyalty to Yahweh and his covenant, will the righteous man live (Hab. 2:4). In these instances the verb יְחיֶהָ connotes not only physical survival in a time of disaster, but also living in right relation to God. 28

Ethical responsibilities, however, must not be used to distort the ultimate, theocentric foundation of biblical life. The most significant aspect of the Hebrew understanding of “life,” is “its dependence on God.” 29 Consequently, it is appropriate to classify the יְחיֶהָ of Hab 2:4b under the heading of the “pregnant sense of fulness of life in divine favour.” 30

Semantic considerations pertaining to יְחיֶהָ

The significance of יְחיֶהָ in Hab 2:4b and in its mediate connection (i.e., through the Greek rendering πίστις) to the NT references supersedes all the other hermeneutical challenges of this investigation.

1. The usage of יְחיֶהָ. 31 The feminine noun יְחיֶהָ in the OT primarily connotes “firmness, steadfastness, fidelity.” 32 Of particular 28Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, 165.

29Ibid., 168.

30BDB 311.

32BDB 53. For a helpful survey in chart form listing every occurrence, the KJV rendering, point of reference, and meaning, see: Bryant, “The Meaning of Habakkuk 2:4,” 20-24.
significance is the employment of the word in the sense of "faithfulness." When referring to God, this usage reflects a divine attribute often paralleled with his מְסֵד or his קָדוֹשׁ (cf. Pss 88:12; 89:2, 3, 6, 9, 25; 96:13; 98:3; 119:90; 143:1; Hos 2:22 [all versifications from Hebrew Bible]). The word has a passive meaning in the overwhelming number of cases; note the following excerpts from Lightfoot's research:

It will thus be seen that מְסֵד properly represents the passive sense of πίστις, as indeed the form of the word shows. . . . Thus in its biblical usage the word מְסֵד can scarcely be said ever to have the sense "belief, trust," though sometimes approaching towards it. . . . Unlike the Hebrew, the Greek word seems to have started from the active meaning. . . . In the Old Testament, there being no Hebrew equivalent to the active meaning, πίστις has always the passive sense, "fidelity," "constancy," unless the passage in Habakkuk be regarded as an exception.34

Thus, there would be no debate regarding the significance of מְסֵד in Hab 2:4b if its usage was determined by statistical precedent. For this reason, many would conclude that "אֲמֻנַּת seems . . . to emphasize one's own inner attitude and the conduct it produces"35 and that its significance is "constancy in executing and fulfilling the commands of God through all uncertainty and conflict."36 Nevertheless, the usage of מְסֵד in Hab 2:4b could be regarded as transitional and consequently could be construed to bear a double sense (i.e., both active and passive).37 In the light of this possibility, further pursuits are necessary.

2. The theoretical root [תָּמָם]. After a survey of the cognates of מָסָּה (e.g., Arabic, Ethiopic, South Arabic, Syriac, etc.),38 one might be led to conclude unreservedly that "the basic idea underlying the root is that of firmness or fixity"39 and that:

33 Ibid.; cf. usage category 3. Also, see usage category 4 in: KB 1. 60.
34 J. B. Lightfoot, The Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians (reprinted; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1957) 155, 156. Lightfoot's whole excursus, "The words denoting 'Faith,'" should be studied; it is a valuable synopsis (ibid., 154-58).
35 Jepsen, TDOT 1. 317.
37 Lightfoot, Galatians, 155. The contention that the usage of מְסֵד in Hab 2:4b is transitional and that it actually attains to an active meaning is actively supported and delineated by Barr: Semantics, 201.
38 Cf. Barr, Semantics, 185-86.
39 Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 66. Dodd, along with others, would also argue that "the Greek translators show themselves aware of this by occasionally translating
When a Hebrew heard the various words derived from the root ḫmn, the basic idea that came to his mind was apparently "constancy." When they were used of things, they meant "continual"; and when they were connected with persons, "reliability." 40

Nevertheless, Jepsen interjects a crucial qualification: "However, derivatives could have special meanings in any given context." 41 This qualification is the polemical standard of Barr:

Even assuming, therefore, that the "ultimate" etymology of words of the root ḫ-mn is "firmness," we have here an illustration of the harm of paying excessive attention to the most ultimate etymology and failing to consider what forms were current at the relevant times and what senses they bore in actual usage. Extant forms are not derived directly from the ultimate etymology or from the "root meaning." There is a detailed and often complicated history for each form; the fact that for lack of knowledge we often cannot trace it does not mean that we can suppose it does not exist. 42

The significance of Barr's statement is more clearly seen if it is remembered that the Qal perfect of ḫm is not attested in biblical Hebrew.

Built upon the above semantic hypothesis is Barr's suggestion that historically there are really two spheres of the evolution of the usage of ḫmn. 43 The discussion of this debate will be restricted to the biblical data. Dodd's introductory comments are germane:

In the vocabulary of religion and ethics the verb is chiefly used (i) in the niphal participle, which bears the passive meaning "made firm," "confirmed," "established," and so "trustworthy," "faithful"; and (ii) in the hiphil, which means "to be convinced," "to trust." 44

On one side are those who would historically relate the usage of ḫmn exclusively to the Niphal verbal. Many would argue that in the absence of corresponding substantives for the Hiphil's active sense the words from this root by such expressions as στηρίζειν, στήριγμα " (ibid.). However, Barr registers some legitimate objections to such arguments. Cf. Barr, Semantics, 166-71.

---

40Jepsen, TDOT 1. 322-23.
41Ibid., 323.
42Barr, Semantics, 187. For Barr's polemic against the "fundamental meaning" syndrome which leads to the "root fallacy" complication in relation to ḫm, see: ibid., 161ff. He argues against "an illegitimate confusion of theological and linguistic methods" (163). His argument is well taken; however, theological presuppositions are never totally set aside, as illustrated sporadically within his own discussion.
43See his argument: ibid., 186-87.
44Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 66.
(cf. Aramaic אמונת, “faith”), “the substantives נאמן, נאמן, represent the sense of the niphal, ‘steadfastness,’ ‘trustworthiness,’ ‘faithfulness’”\(^{45}\). Therefore, נאמן would be taken to denote “trustworthiness, the frame of mind which can be relied upon.”\(^{46}\)

On the other side are those who would emphasize an overriding relationship of נאמן to נאמן. Barr argues that “... the whole structure built upon the supposed ‘fundamental meaning’ of the root collapses as soon as real attention is given to the verb הָетесь ‘believe’”\(^{47}\). This relationship (i.e., of נאמן to נאמן) is developed to support an active sense for the substantive (i.e., נאמן = “trustfulness, the frame of mind which relies on another”).\(^{48}\) Vitally related to this argument is the discussion of the function of the Hiphil of נאמן. This is adequately attended by Barr, who opts for an “internal-transitive” function as opposed to a “declarative-estimative” function.\(^{49}\)

Up to this point, the examination of this semantic debate has not been complicated by mediating positions; however, there are many who rightly contend that construing נאמן as exclusively passive or as exclusively active upsets a fine biblical balance. For this reason, a mediating position is undoubtedly the preferable way of striving for theological harmony of all the scriptural data. Unfortunately, there are varieties of mediating positions which multiply the complexity of this pursuit for balance. At least two major varieties are worthy of mention. For convenience, they might be labeled lexical (i.e., the word נאמן as it relates to both its active and passive historical spheres) and contextual (i.e., the context of נאמן in Hab 2:4b, especially the relationship of נאמן in its largest context). Presuppositions are also obvious in these mediating positions; however, as previously intimated, this is unavoidable. Consequently, a continuous evaluation of one’s presuppositions is mandatory in order to determine whether they are valid or invalid as measured by the theological totality of revelation.

Eadie’s generalization concerning the נאמן of man serves as a fitting introduction to a mediating position: “The idea of steadfastness expressed by the Hebrew noun implies faith.”\(^{50}\)

---

\(^{45}\)Ibid., 68. Cf. ibid. 59ff.; Lightfoot, Galatians, 155; and. Barr, Semantics, 173, 198, 201-5.

\(^{46}\)Lightfoot’s delineation of the passive sense: Galatians, 154.

\(^{47}\)Barr, Semantics, 164. For some pertinent observations on πιστεύειν with the dative paralleling הָнятие, see: Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 66-68.

\(^{48}\)Lightfoot, Galatians, 154.

\(^{49}\)Barr, Semantics, 176ff. His argument corroborates his earlier assertion that “the subject of the verb הָнятие is frequently or normally a man” (ibid., 164).

\(^{50}\)Eadie, Galatians, 244.
credible argument for a balanced conception of אֶרֶם may be noted in Keil's presentation:

אֶרֶם does not denote “an honourable character, or fidelity to conviction” (Hitzig), but . . . firmness (Ex. xvii. 12); then, as an attribute of God, trustworthiness, unchangeable fidelity in the fulfillment of His promises (Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. xxxiii. 4, lxxxix. 34); and, as a personal attribute of man, fidelity in word and deed (Jer. vii. 28, ix. 2; Ps. xxxvii. 3); and, in his relation to God, firm attachment to God, an undisturbed confidence in the divine promises of grace, firma fiducia and fides, so that in אֶרֶם the primary meanings of אֶרֶם and אֶרֶם are combined. This is also apparent from the fact that Abraham is called אֶרֶם in Neh. ix. 8, with reference to the fact that it is affirmed of him in Gen. xv. 6 that בִּנְיָמִין, “he trusted, or believed, the Lord;” and still more indisputably from the passage before us, since it is impossible to mistake the reference in אֶרֶם to Gen. xv. 6, “he believed (אֶרֶם) in Jehovah, and He reckoned it to him לֶאַשְׂדָּדָה.”

It is obvious that a balanced conception of אֶרֶם in Hab 2:4b will avoid the error of taking the words to mean that one is justified by character. It will also avoid synergistic conceptions of the non-biblical variety. At the same time, אֶרֶם may be conceived of as a “fruit of faith”: “faithful faith” or “steadfast trust.” Bryant, after discussing the active and passive options for אֶרֶם and leaning towards an emphasis upon the former, concludes:

It must be carefully maintained that neither the Old nor the New Testament separate faith from its fruits of faithfulness. The distinction between faith and faithfulness is somewhat artificial, for . . . in the long 51Keil, Minor Prophets, 2. 73. “And in addition to this, אֶרֶם is opposed to the pride of the Chaldaean, to his exaltation of himself above God; and for that very reason it cannot denote integrity in itself, but simply some quality which has for its leading feature humble submission to God, that is to say, faith, or firm reliance upon God” (ibid., 74). For more discussion on the theocentric footing of an anthropological manifestation of fidelity, see: C. von Orelli, The Old Testament Prophecy of the Consummation of God’s Kingdom, trans. by J. S. Banks (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1885) 325-27; Delitzsch, Hebrews, 2. 200; and J. B. Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962) 314. For corroborations of a mediating position in general, see: Ellis, Paul’s Use of the Old Testament, 119-20; Johnson, “The Gospel That Paul Preached,” 340, n. 31; Lightfoot, Galatians, 154ff.

52A good illustration would be the DSS pesher of Hab 2:4b. For discussion, see: G. Bertram, “ςυνεργυς, τιμωρεσθαι,” TDNT 7. 873.

run they are the same thing. The Bible knows nothing of a true faith which does not hold fast its confidence to the end.\textsuperscript{54}

\textbf{Syntactical considerations}

The preposition ב attached to אמת is obviously instrumental. Von Orelli suggests that the "ב introduces the efficient medium of the preservation of life, as in Ezek. xviii. 22."\textsuperscript{55} Also, the whole phrase (i.e., אמת ב אמת) should be taken with אמת, not with אמת ב.\textsuperscript{56}

\textbf{EXTERNAL CHALLENGES}

\textbf{The larger context}

\textit{The book.} An awareness of the destructive attempts to transpose major sections of chaps. 1 and 2 of Habakkuk enables the interpreter to identify eccentric contextual associations relating to Hab 2:4b.\textsuperscript{57} The traditional order of the text of the first two chapters constitutes the larger context:

The text, as it now stands, permits a perfectly natural development of the prophet's thought; in reality, the development becomes more vivid, for instead of one problem that perplexes the prophet we have two, and instead of one divine reply we have two. Surely there is nothing impossible or improbable in this. . . . On the whole, the . . . interpretation, which requires no omissions or transpositions, seems to satisfy most completely the facts in the case.\textsuperscript{58}

\textsuperscript{55}Von Orelli, \textit{The Old Testament Prophecy of the Consummation of God's Kingdom}, 325, n. 2.

\textsuperscript{56}Cf. Keil, \textit{Minor Prophets}, 2. 73; R. C. H. Lenski, \textit{The Interpretation of St. Paul's Epistles to the Galatians, to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians} (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1937) 143-44; and the forthcoming discussion of ה' πίστευσις in Rom 1:17.

\textsuperscript{58}F. C. Eiselen, \textit{The Minor Prophets} (New York: Eaton & Mains, 1907) 467-68. Refutations of transpositions based upon elaborate chiastic fabrications are neither
The "placarded revelation"\(^{59}\)

In Hab 2:2-3, the prophet is given instructions which clearly suggest the priority of this הָנָה (v 2). These verses "form the introduction to the Word of God, which the prophet receives in reply to his cry of lamentation addressed to the Lord in ch. i.12-17."\(^{60}\) Though Keil would include v 1 of chap 2 in this introduction, it is better to regard Hab 2:1 as transitional. It is the climactic summons of the prophet's second lament (i.e., 1:12-2:1).

Verse 2 is particularly significant: "Then the LORD answered me and said, 'Write down [הָנָה] the vision and make it plain upon the tablets [הָנָה-הָנָה] in order that one who reads it may run.'" Interestingly, Holt paraphrases the last part of v 2: "so he who reads it may live obediently."\(^{61}\) He, of course, is taking הָנָה metaphorically (cf. metaphorical הָנָה; cf. also הָנָה in Ps 119:32, and the running metaphors of the NT, e.g., 1 Cor 9:24-27, Phil 3:13-14, etc.). This view is at least worthy of some consideration in the light of the ethically climactic context. הָנָה generates most of the discussion which ultimately pertains to Hab 2:4b. It has been suggested that the article implies particular tablets which were displayed publicly;\(^{62}\) however, this is an unnecessary conjecture.\(^{63}\) "The article . . . may only designate the tablets which were to be employed for the purpose. It may merely indicate these as definite in the mind of the speaker."\(^{64}\)

The plural termination has been employed to substantiate a larger scope (cf. below) for this "placarded revelation."\(^{65}\) But, the

---

\(^{59}\) Brownlee's appropriate terminology pertaining to this contextual challenge: Brownlee, "The Placarded Revelation of Habakkuk," 319.

\(^{60}\) Keil, Minor Prophets, 2. 67-68.

\(^{61}\) J. M. Holt, "So He May Run Who Reads It," JBL 83 (1964) 301. For a presentation of the traditional interpretations of the words involving facility in the communication and/or dissemination of this vision, see: Henderson, The Twelve Minor Prophets, 301.

\(^{62}\) E.g., T. Laetsch, Bible Commentary: The Minor Prophets (St. Louis: Concordia, 1956) 330; cf. Ewald's view as delineated in Henderson, The Twelve Minor Prophets, 301.

\(^{64}\) Henderson, The Twelve Minor Prophets, 301.

\(^{65}\) Kleinert so argues: "The reason that several tablets are mentioned here, and not one, as in Isaiah [8:1], is found in the rich and various contents of the five-fold woe" (Kleinert, "Habakkuk," 22).
plural could also be explained in the following manner: "The 'tablets' or 'plaques' represent multiple copies, each of which is to be set up in a prominent place." It is no wonder that Laetsch admits that "just how long the inscription to be written by Habakkuk was is hard to tell." Nevertheless, a survey of the pertinent syntactical data and the major positions is required.

1. It's scope. Five separate viewpoints concerning the length of the inscription can be distinguished; two view it as short, and three as long. The two "short" views are summarized adequately by Brownlee:

Scholars who look for a brief text as the placarded revelation of Habakkuk usually restrict it to 2:4, interpreting 2:5-6a as an introduction to a taunt song over the fall of Babylon. However, J.M.P. Smith in An American Translation links vss. 4-5 together in a separate paragraph, and the RSV has followed suit. The argument for including these two verses is that the particles $we^naf ki$ at the beginning of vs. 5 are conjunctive.

The $u$ $n$ is syntactically important. This fact must be recognized regardless of the problem involved. It is suggested that the either/or option might be sensibly replaced by a both/and perspective in reference to the development of the argument. It seems best to take the binder as "and furthermore," or "moreover, in addition." Emerton's suggestion will be accepted: "The words $we^nap ki$, with which verse 5 begins, link it to verse 4 and suggest that it is part of God's answer to the prophet...." Consequently, v 4 can be understood as the crucial lesson of God's disclosure which was to be recorded (i.e., the unrighteous one's essence is perverted), and vv 5ff.

69 BDB 65.

could be conceived of as the consequent lesson (i.e., the unrighteous one's actions are perverted).

Only one of the three major suggestions for a longer scope is worthy of development. The other two, the "vision" to be recorded refers to the revelation of 1:5-11, and the יִתְנֶה should be taken literally as a reference to the theophany of chap. 3, are surveyed by Brownlee. They are not viable options.\textsuperscript{72} The viable suggestion pertains to the רְשֵׁי clause commencing at v 2:5b. This binder suggests that the divine disclosure to be recorded is not to be restricted exclusively to the contents of Hab 2:4-5a. Keil notes that "the allusion to the Chaldaean is evident from the relative clause which follows, and which Delitzsch very properly calls an individualizing exegesis to יִתְנֶה יִבְרָן."\textsuperscript{73}

Prior to a contextual summary, it must be noted that there is also a piece of logical syntax which continues this interwoven disclosure; the obvious antecedent of יִגְדִּית (v 6) is יִתְנֶה יִבְרָן, who are the objects of the oppressor's tyranny.\textsuperscript{74} Based upon the above observations, it is most likely that the "placarded revelation" extends beyond the disclosure of v 4. It is suggested, therefore, that v 4 be considered the primary "general principle to be applied in a particular case as here with the ungodly Chaldeans."\textsuperscript{75} (The revelation of Hab 2:5a could be viewed as a secondary or supplemental maxim.)

The immediate context

"The immediate context of vs. 4b (i.e., vss. 4a and 5a)," Gowan concedes, "is about as difficult as any part of the Old Testament to understand."\textsuperscript{76} Three major problems are usually cited. First, it is often assumed that there is a "lost subject"\textsuperscript{77} in Hab 2:4a. As an example, Taylor argues that "a noun form is expected as a counterpart to righteous, which occurs in the second half of the verse; 'the wicked' would be normal and is found in the Aramaic paraphrase

\textsuperscript{74}Cf. Emerton, "The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5," 3.

\textsuperscript{75}Bryant, "The Meaning of Habakkuk 2:4," 59-60. Cf. von Orelli's "mashal-like principle" (\textit{The Old Testament Prophecy of the Consummation of God's Kingdom}, 327) and Brownlee's "aphorism" ("The Composition of Habakkuk," 265). For further discussion on these general principles and their application to the nearest historical reference point (i.e., Babylon), see: Kleinert, "Habakkuk," 22, 24.

\textsuperscript{76}Gowan, \textit{The Triumph of Faith in Habakkuk}, 44.

\textsuperscript{77}Brownlee, "The Composition of Habakkuk," 265.
Second, it is also argued that a leading verb in the same line is missing (i.e., one parallel to the נָשִׁי of 2:4b). Finally, it is alleged that the reference to "wine" in Hab 2:5a is incongruous; Gowan facetiously brings this out when he comments:

In the RSV, "but the righteous shall live by his faith," is followed by, "Moreover, wine is treacherous," and somehow that doesn't seem the place for a temperance lesson. This is a really frustrating passage for an exegete, for it seems that now we have come to the pivotal point of the book, and we're not sure what verse 5a means!

Habakkuk 2:4a. Southwell looks for the "missing subject" in נָשִׁי; he conjectures that it should be revocalized נָשִׁי from the root נָשַׁי, rendering it "the eminent man." However, it is best to understand נָשִׁי in its normal sense as an interjection: "behold!" It is usually an "interrupting call for attention." אֲנַפָּדָה presents a seemingly impossible challenge of decipherment. A broad perspective on the problems involved is gained by Keil's general comment: "The early translators and commentators have taken this hemistich differently. They divide it into protasis and apodosis, and take נָשִׁי either as the predicate or as the subject." Emerton's synopsis of the factors contributing to the complication is adequate:

The difficulty is to determine the meaning of the obscure word כֹּפֶלָן, and to find the right way of construing it with the other words in this part of the verse. The word appears to be the third person feminine singular perfect pu'el of כֹּל. B.D.B. distinguishes between two different roots כֹּל. To root I belong the noun כֹּפֵלת, "hemorrhoids," and also the place Ophel, to which B.D.B. ascribes the meaning "mound, hill." The Arabic noun כֹּפַל, "tumour," is compared, and it is suggested that the meaning of the Hebrew verb is "swell." The 78 Taylor, "Introduction and Exegesis of the Book of Habakkuk," 988-89. However, some would argue that such a subject (viz., the Chaldean) is "inferred." Cf. Keil, Minor Prophets, 2. 72.

79 For conjectures which are tailored to fit this assumption, see Emerton's survey: Emerton, "The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5," 15-16.
80 Gowan, The Triumph of Faith in Habakkuk, 44.
82 Cf. the Ugaritic ln II (UT 391) and the Akkadian annuma, "now" (KB 238).
83 KB 238-39; BDB 243-44. Cf. Emerton, "The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5," 11. The possibility of a syntactical correlation with the כֹּפֶלָן of v 5 has previously been mentioned as a possible option; however, more evidence is desirable. Cf. Brownlee, "The Composition of Habakkuk," 265.
84 Keil, Minor Prophets, 2. 72.
only place where the verb occurs in the Hebrew Bible is Hab. ii.4, and B.D.B. expresses doubt about the correctness of the text. Root II occurs in Num. xiv.44 . . . B.D.B. thinks that the verb there perhaps means “be heedless,” and compares Arabic ḡafala, “be heedless, neglectful, inadvertent.” It may be noted that none of the ancient versions of Hab. ii.4 supports either of the two meanings of the root given by B.D.B. The LXX has [ἐὰν] ὑποστείλητα (“If he should draw back”), Aquila νωχελευομένου (“the slothful”), the Vulgate “qui incredulus est,” the Peshitta ṣawwālā (“and in the wicked man”) or ṣawwālā (“and in iniquity”), and the Targum ṣaṣṣayyā (“the wicked”).

To this needs to be added a significant observation by Brownlee: ἀνέπλησεν at vii.14 confirms both text and vocalization of Mt 2:4 ἀνέπλησεν.”

In spite of the significance of the last piece of evidence, there still remain “theories that find in ὑππελάθ a word for blameworthy person” and “theories that find in ὑππελάθ a word denoting the downfall of the wicked.” Most advocates of the former theory offer their suggestions based upon the assumption that ἦν ὀψίν is “strictly antithetical to ἰδιὰ.” Supporters of the latter theory consider ἦν ὀψίν to be antithetical to ἀνέπλησεν. Emerton adds a conjecture of his own. It

Emerton, “The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5,” 11. A suggested rendering of the LXX would be, “If he draw back, my soul is not well pleased with him.” And, for Aquila, “Behold, the lazy, my soul is not straight with him.” Cf. Taylor, “Introduction and Exegesis of the Book of Habakkuk,” 988. On ὑππελάθ, see: LSJ 1895-96; TDNT, 7. 597-99. For more commentary on the Greek divergencies, see: B. F. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950) 337-38; and Bruce, Hebrews, 272, n. 195. Cf. Driver’s undesirable conjecture based upon Aquila (cf. δεύτερον II in KB 723): G. R. Driver, “Linguistic and Textual Problems: Minor Prophets III.” JTS 39 (1938) 395. For undesirable conjectures based upon the Syrian, see: Kelly, “The Strophic Structure of Habakkuk,” 103, n. 15. Henderson well notes that “the Syr. . . . wickedness, is founded upon a mistake of ἦν ὀψίν for ἐνλαβότα.” Henderson, The Twelve Minor Prophets, 303. Brownlee’s synopsis of the data is pertinent: “The versions seem to have read quite differently. G’s rendering ὑποστείλητα, Aq’s νοστευομένου, and the Palestinian recension’s . . . [g]κοταύ all seem to be based upon νῆθύν, which in the Pūṣal means “be covered, obscure, swoon.” T is too paraphrastic to be of assistance here, nor can one be sure of the Vorlage of the Latin; but in both is the thought of unbelief read into the verb, an interpretation which could rest upon νῆθύν taken to refer to a giving-up in despair through insufficient faith in the promises of God . . . G. R. Driver . . . suggests that the Vorlage of Aq. and V was ἦν ὀψίν, which after the Arabic . . . he interprets to mean ‘the heedless man’” (Brownlee, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran, 43-44).

Emerton, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran, 43.

Henderson, The Twelve Minor Prophets, 303. He suggests that ἦν ὀψίν be construed as “an abstract noun, used elliptically for ᾧ ὀψίν, a man of arrogance or presumption, and so to be rendered adjectively, the proud, presumptuous, &c.” (ibid.).
would fall into the latter category "denoting the downfall of the wicked." Its advantage is that it does not change the consonantal text but only divides על
ל ויהי
 His construes the following portion of the line as a relative clause (as do others), and renders the line: "Behold, he whose personality within him is not upright will fly away (i.e., pass away, perish [i.e., antithetical to יִזְרָא in 2:4b])." Though there are advantages to his conjecture, its weakness is its novelty.

Lexically, an association with יִזְרָא I is preferable. In view of the likely parallelism with יִזְרַע, a metaphorical extension of על is the best interpretation:

His soul is puffed up. על יִזְרָא, perf. pual of עָלֶל, of which the hiphil only occurs in Num. xiv.44, and that as synonymous with רְוֵי in Deut. i.43. From this, as well as from the noun על, a hill or swelling we get the meaning, to be swollen up, puffed up, proud; and in the hiphil, to act haughtily or presumptuously.

An apparently similar lexical survey undergirds von Orelli's conclusion: "Such hollow self-exaltation has been from the time of Gen. iii. a mark of a world estranged from God, and has its root in ethical impurity." Syntactically, there still remains the problem of rendering this verb in the light of the remainder of the line. Considering the force of יִזְרָא and the concord of gender, it seems best to render it indefinitely as a maxim and appositionally with the climactic addition of the assertion which follows it: "Behold, it [i.e. his internal self, cf. יִזְרַע] is swollen, his soul within him is not level; but a righteous one should live by his faithfulness."

The יִזְרָא in יִזְרַע most likely possesses a metaphorically extended sense (i.e., ethical). Brownlee suggests the rendering "humble":

One will observe ... that the translation "humble" for yasherlah is according to the context. The root idea in this figurative word is

---

90Cf. KB 723.
92Keil, Minor Prophets, 2. 72.
93Von Orelli, The Old Testament Prophecy of the Consummation of God's Kingdom, 324.
94Cf. Emerton, "The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5," 11; Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 42ff. On the full writing in the Qumran text, see: Brownlee, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran, 44. For general data with the important cognates, see: KB 413-14.
“level,” not “vertical” — although the well-nigh universal English translation “upright” would seem to suggest the latter. The verb is used for the leveling of hills and valleys in Isa. 40:3. In Hab. 2:4, where levelness is antithetical to “puffed up,” it is clear that the word means humility. The essence of sin according to all the Hebrew prophets is pride and rebellion .... \textsuperscript{95}

שמגו (in יהוה), of course, has a wide range of usage.

In this context, the word נפש seems to denote something like ‘personality,’ and the clause in which it appears should probably be translated ‘his personality within him is not upright.’ ... If so, it says that the person to whom it refers has a bad character.\textsuperscript{96}

Habakkuk 2:5a. Lehrman notes that Hab 2:5a is “a very difficult verse which has been variously explained by the older commentators and given up as unintelligible by the moderns.”\textsuperscript{97} The variants represented by the versions here present the greatest challenge.\textsuperscript{98}

The is the leading challenge. An excerpt from the text found in the Qumran commentary reads דְּוֹנֹּב [ or will be] treacherous”\textsuperscript{99}. Emerton argues for this variant and bolsters his contention with evidence which would support the fact that “a saying about the treacherous nature of wealth would be in keeping with what is said about it in wisdom literature ...”\textsuperscript{100} Certainly, this reading is worthy of consideration.\textsuperscript{101}

Nevertheless, the Hebrew text as it stands is not unintelligible. Textually, it should be noted that “the paraphrastic renderings of T and V suggest a Vorlage in appropriate agreement with MT.”\textsuperscript{102} also has proverbial connections (cf. Prov 20:1; Hos 4:11; Isa 5:11; Jer 23:9; Eccl 10:19).\textsuperscript{103} Historically, a maxim concerning “wine” would

\textsuperscript{95}Brownlee, “The Placarded Revelation of Habakkuk,” 324-25. The objective negation (אָכַל) of the text should be noted.

\textsuperscript{96}Emerton, “The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5,” 11.

\textsuperscript{97}Lehrman, “Habakkuk,” 219.

\textsuperscript{98}Cf. Brownlee’s detailed outline of the textual data: Brownlee, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran, 45-50.

\textsuperscript{100}Ibid., 8. Cf. his evidence, 8-9.

\textsuperscript{101}Emendations based upon the Greek renderings are totally unacceptable. For an example, see: Brownlee, “The Placarded Revelation of Habakkuk,” 324. For arguments against conjectures based upon the Greek readings, see: Emerton, “The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5,” 1-2, 9.

\textsuperscript{102}Brownlee, The Text of Habakkuk in the Ancient Commentary from Qumran, 46. “דרוב [ or דיבוב [ ] at vii.3 is a radical departure from Mt 2:5 דֵבָּב [ ]” (ibid. 45).

\textsuperscript{103}Emerton, “The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5,” 7.
be particularly appropriate as its truth could be related to and illustrated by the Chaldeans (cf. Daniel 5).\textsuperscript{104}

Keil’s summary of the second portion of the line is helpful:

The following words \(\text{בְּנָקָקִים}\) are not the object to \(\text{כָּלַב}\), but form a fresh sentence, parallel to the preceding one: a boasting man, he continueth not, \(\text{דָיִן}\) introduces the apodosis to \(\text{כָּלַב}\), which is written absolutely. \(\text{דָיִן}\) only occurs again in Prov. xxi. 24, and is used there as a parallel to \(\text{זִיוֹן}\): \(\alpha\lambda\alpha\zeta\omicron\nu\) (LXX), swaggering, boasting.\textsuperscript{105}

\(\text{דָיִן}\) is apparently a denominative hapax legomenon: “move, walk to a place (nomads to pasture).”\textsuperscript{106} From this, it is possible (based upon an Arabic parallel) that the intent of \(\text{דָיִן}\) would be “reach one’s aim.”\textsuperscript{107} A suggested rendering for Hab 2:5a would be: “Wine is treacherous, a proud man, and he will not be successful.” An advantage of this rendering is that it is somewhat analogous to the divergent metrical pattern already recognized and accepted in 2:4a. This rendering is one rejected by Emerton (on the basis of its personification) after comparison to two other renderings:

(b) Wine deals treacherously with the proud man, and he will not be successful.
(c) Wine is treacherous, and the proud man will not be successful.

Translation (b), which understands the verb \(\text{בֹּדֶד}\) to take a direct object as in Ps. lxxiii. 15, should probably be rejected, because the natural division into lines of poetry is against it. In translation (c), the first two words of the second line are understood to be in \textit{casus pendens}.\textsuperscript{108}

\textit{Logical parallels.} In the light of the multiplicity of challenges relating to Hab 2:4a and 2:5a, it might seem that the immediate context is basically unintelligible. However, it should be obvious already that the basic argument of the passage is not obscured. Logical parallels compensate for particular points of uncertainty. Gowan’s reconstructions, although they do not harmonize \textit{totally} with previously chosen options, do lead to a proper understanding of the crucial issue:

\textsuperscript{106}KB 601. Cf. BDB 627.

\textsuperscript{107}KB 601 (note their uncertainty). On both the significance of the Arabic parallel and challenges concerning the pointing of the verb as a Qal, see: Driver, “Linguistic and Textual Problems: Minor Prophets III,” 395; and Emerton, “The Textual and Linguistic Problems of Habakkuk II.4-5,” 5.

If we find that we cannot have any real confidence (at present) in any of these suggestions, then clearly the crucial question for us is whether there is still a possibility of understanding vs. 4b in terms of its larger context, and I believe that there is. A contrast certainly is being presented between two ways: the way of vs. 4b and that of vs. 4a and possibly also 5a. So “life” in 4b is contrasted with the distortion of the person in 4a, and possibly also with the lack of endurance in 5a. “Righteousness” in 4b is contrasted with that negative quality of which we are uncertain in 4a and perhaps also with treachery and arrogance in 5a. What makes the difference between the two ways is faithfulness, and so we must try to see how that speaks to all that has gone before in Habakkuk.109

UTILIZATION CHALLENGES

Three times in the NT Hab 2:4b is employed in crucial lines of argumentation. There are contextual affinities between Paul’s lines of argument in Rom 1:17 and Gal 3:11; however, these contexts are essentially different from the contextual thrust of Hab 2:4b.110 The employment of Habakkuk’s text in Heb 10:38 (cf. vv 37-38), however, does reflect a degree of affinity in reference to OT and NT contexts. Ellis’ generalizations concerning these phenomena are helpful as a footing upon which to build an investigation:

Hab. 2.4 is cited by Paul (Rom. 1.17; Gal. 3.11) to show that righteousness is not achieved through obedience to the law but through faith; the author of Hebrews uses the same passage to describe the proper attitude of the Christian toward the trials of life. In each case the life of the true believer rests on faith, but the application of the passage varies.111

It is difficult to discern how many and how valid are Ellis’ presuppositions in reference to the last sentence in this quote. It is appropriate to reiterate a major reason for the multiplicity of hermeneutical challenges relating to Hab 2:4b and its employment in the NT. Many interpreters have approached the problem in reverse by noting Paul’s

109 Gowan, The Triumph of Faith in Habakkuk, 45.
110 Attempts to harmonize plenarily the OT and NT contexts, aside from some peripheral benefits, have not convincingly proved their case. Cf. M. H. Franzmann, Concordia Commentary: Romans (St. Louis and London: Concordia, 1968) 34-38. Regarding the employment of Hab 2:4 in the NT, see Bryant, “The Meaning of Habakkuk 2:4,” 36-42. For general principles pertaining to NT quotations from the LXX (including divergencies), see: E. J. Young, Thy Word Is Truth (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957) 149-50.
citations in their context first; then, standing upon this presuppositional base, they work back to the original passage in order to interpret it. There is a need for an ultimate perspective which is systematic in scope; however, the aforementioned procedure must not be the means to that end.

Prior to a cursory examination of the NT passages, the major problem concerning the usage of πίστις needs to be remembered: “It is to be observed that the Greek word πίστις is ambiguous. It means both ‘faithfulness,’ and ‘belief’ or ‘trust.’” 112

In Paul

In spite of the fact that Paul’s usages contextually suggest a different thrust of argument (or at least a different emphasis) from the original context, some would still insist that he is employing πίστις in a manner similar to the original ἡμισά. These arguments follow various paths, but one of the most common suggestions is that all the contexts are emphasizing the faithfulness of God. 113

Romans 1:17. Most of the phenomena of the Greek rendering (e.g. Rom 1:17b) have been previously discussed in conjunction with the Septuagint’s renderings of the Hebrew text of Hab 2:4b (cf. above), 114 but a consideration of related factors in the immediate context of Rom 1:17b is necessary. 115

It was noted that the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ in Rom 1:17a has been construed in various ways. 116 The major problem here is “... whether δικαιοσύνη refers to an activity of God or to a status of man

112 Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, 69. Cf. W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1915) 31-34. See also the previous discussion on ἡμισά. Cf.: “When ἡμισά as πίστις is given a more general sense in R. 1:17; Gl. 3:11 ... this is not wrong but it is certainly a development of the original meaning” (Quell and Schrenk, TDNT 2. 177, n. 12).

116 Cf. n. 5. On δικαιοσύνη, also review: Sanday and Headlam, Romans, 30-31; and n. 17, above.
resulting from God's action, righteousness as a gift from God."¹¹⁷ To this must be added the related matter of the nature of the genitive θεοῦ.¹¹⁸ Without denying the essential truths pertaining to the former position, Paul's total argument would seem to confirm the intent of the latter — the word refers to man's status.

Another point of contention in this debate is the compound prepositional phrase ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν. Harris' survey merely scratches the surface:

A myriad of proposals have been made in regard to the meaning of the phrase ek pisteōs eis pistin, such as: from the faith of the preacher to the faith of the hearer; from God's faithfulness to man's faith; from smaller to greater degree of faith (cf. apo doxēs eis doxan, 2 Cor. 3:18); from faith as a starting-point to faith as a permanent condition. But it seems more natural to construe ek as indicating not the source or starting-point ("from faith") but the basis or means ("by faith," as in Hab. 2:4), with the eis pistin either intensifying the effect of ek pisteōs (thus, "by faith from first to last," New International Version), or denoting the goal of God's impartation to men of a righteous status ("leading to faith"). On either of these latter views, faith is portrayed as the vital and perpetual characteristic of Christian experience.¹¹⁹

Harris' last suggestion, in the light of a broad theological scope, is worthy of particular consideration; it might be roughly construed as follows: the first πίστις emphasizes an active nuance, and the second πίστις, being goal oriented (i.e., εἰς), emphasizes a passive nuance. The second view (i.e., "from God's faithfulness to man's faith") has been employed in an attempt to bolster the contention that God's fidelity is the major argument that permeates both the contexts of Rom 1:17b and of Hab 2:4b. Murray recognizes the important contribution of such arguments, but he exposes their essential flaw:

It is fully admitted that wherever there is faith there is always the faithfulness of God and of Christ to which that faith is directed and from which it takes its origin. In other words, faith always involves this polarized situation... It is one thing to say that our faith always involves a polarized situation; it is another thing altogether to say that faith is a polarized expression.¹²⁰

¹¹⁷Cranfield, Romans, 1. 96.
¹²⁰Murray, Romans, 1. 373.
In the light of all the data undergirding these synopses, Meyer’s general conclusion concerning Rom 1:17 is accepted: “Finally, ... to understand πίστις εἰς πίστιν in the sense of faith in the faithfulness of God ..., is to introduce what is neither in the words nor yet suggested by the context.”

Galatians 3:11. A similar tension arises when the context of Gal 3:11b is compared with that of Hab 2:4b. Ramsay’s contextual survey pays particular attention not only to the utilization of Hab 2:4b in Gal 3:11 but also to Gen 15:6 in Gal 3:6:

The phrase ἐκ πίστεως is used only once in the Septuagint, Habakkuk II 4 — “The just shall live by his faith.” Paul took this saying, connected it with Genesis XV 6 — “Abraham believed in the Lord, and he counted to him for righteousness” — and found in the two the proof of his doctrine of the righteousness that is of faith — δικαιοσύνη τῆς ἐκ πίστεως.

This interpretation of the data is certainly more credible than that proposed by Longenecker: “The context of Gal. 3:11 indicates that Paul interpreted Hab. 2:4 [italics added] as human trust and reliance, not as human faithfulness or even the divine faithfulness of the LXX rendering ek pisteōs mou.” A more careful approach would be “that Paul has used the Habakkuk passage analogically. The principle of justification by faith in the promises of God and not in human endeavor, initially set forth so clearly in the story of Abraham, is found also in Habakkuk” [italics added]. Burton’s careful summary of the tension demonstrates a greater degree of hermeneutical insight, as seen in the following excerpts:

The particular sense which the words bore for Paul and which he intended them to convey to his readers is undoubtedly to be determined rather by Pauline usage in general, and by the part which the sentence plays in the apostle’s argument, than by the meaning which the original Heb. had for the prophet. By these considerations ... πίστεως bears its usual active sense, required by the context, “faith.” ... The use of the passage with the active sense of πίστις involves no

---

123 W. M. Ramsay, A Historical Commentary on St. Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians (reprinted; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1965) 344.
radical perversion of its meaning, since faith in this sense might easily be conceived to be an ingredient or basis of faithfulness. 126

In Hebrews 127

A contextual affinity between Heb 10:38 and our passage is demonstrable. Dods' extremely brief summary brings out the most significant data concerning Heb 10:37-38:

In Habakkuk the conditions are similar. God's people are crushed under overwhelming odds. And the question with which Habakkuk opens his prophecy is ἐώς τίνος κεκράζωμαι κατ' ὄν μὴ εἰσακούσεις. The Lord assures him that deliverance will come and will not delay. By inserting the article, the writer of Hebrews identifies the deliverer as the Messiah, "the coming One." Cf. Mat. xi.3; Luke vii.19; Jo. vi.14. ὁ δὲ δίκαιος... "And the just shall live by faith," i.e. shall survive these troublous times by believing that the Lord is at hand! 128

The δὲ introducing Heb 10:38 functions disjunctively:

The position of the last two clauses of the citation is reversed to avoid connecting ὑποστείληται with ὁ ἐρχόμενος... If the author of Hebrews had retained the original sequence, this clause would have referred to Christ himself, since the author had already made "the coming one" definitely refer to Christ. In the new position this clause is connected with δίκαιος μου, which is now the subject of the last part of the quotation. The inversion places δὲ at the beginning of the verse, which now indicates the change of subject, the new subject now being the Christian (cf. x.39). 129

Robertson notes that Heb 10:38b (cf. Hab 2:4a, LXX) is a "condition of third class with ean and the first aorist middle subjunctive of hupostellō, old verb to draw oneself under or back, to withdraw, as already in Acts 20:20, 27; Gal. 2:12." Consequently, and also in the light of the larger context of Hebrews 11, Hoyt interprets the major thrust of the message of Heb 10:38-39 (cf. Hab 2:4) as follows:

129 Thomas, "The Old Testament Citations in Hebrews,” 316.

Those who are truly Christian will continue in persistence to the very end (38, 39). The just shall live by faith daily. Those who draw back have never come within divine pleasure.

THEORETICAL CONCLUSIONS

Biblical theology

Reflecting on the important precedent set by usage, it must be stated that the "Heb. ἐμυνα, translated 'faith' in Habakkuk ii.4 (LXX pistis) means 'steadfastness' or 'fidelity.'" Therefore, the emphasis in Habakkuk is on sanctification.

It should be observed, however, that an "emphasis" does not abrogate secondary factors reflected in the immediate and larger contexts. The two spheres of development pertaining to the verbals from the ἸΤΜ-complex must at least be recognized in reference to the ἸΤΜ of Hab 2:4b. More importantly, the background and judicial implications of ἸΠΠΥ must be noted. This is corroborated by the association of the roots ἸΤΜ and ἸΠΠΥ in this single short line.

These factors enlarge the scope of study, because they imply a background which ultimately finds its antecedent in Abraham. Contextual associations with the foundational truth of Gen 15:6 are not only likely in Hab 2:4 but also in the larger contexts of the Pauline citations (cf. Rom 4:3, 9, 22; Gal 3:6). Abraham was justified by faith (compare Gen 15:6 with Romans 4), but biblical faith manifests itself in fidelity. Within this sphere, it is legitimate to render Hab 2:4b as follows: "'Through his fidelity of faith he shall live!'" Ethical implications are preserved but not at the expense of an intricate biblical balance. This is important, because "faith and faithfulness . . . cannot be separated . . . Both are present in his [i.e., Habakkuk's] book, even though his emphasis is on faithfulness."

132 F. F. Bruce, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963) 80.
134 Von Orelli, The Old Testament Prophecy of the Consummation of God's Kingdom, 324.
Systematic theology

Paul's use of Hab 2:4b in Rom 1:17 and Gal 3:11 appears to be at first glance a radical departure from the thrust of the context of the OT passage. "But that does not mean that Paul was wrong in taking Hab 2:4 as the great theme verse for his teaching about justification by faith." It must be remembered that:

Paul does not teach justification by faith in a vacuum. Faith does make one righteous both forensically and, increasingly, in actuality, because faith issues in the ἐν Χριστῷ relationship. Once again, a full circle has been drawn. From this perspective, it is best to conclude with Westcott that "'faith' (in the Pauline sense) and 'faithfulness to God' (which is what the Prophet had in mind), in the long run, are the same thing."138

136 Ibid., 43.
137 Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 119.