A Shipyard in Ancient Issus.

BY REV. W. H. WARD, D.D., LL.D.

The modern town of Hit, the ancient Issus, visited by the Wolfe Expedition, affords an existing illustration of a shipyard of the type of that where Noah built his ark. A dozen or more boats, of the general shape and size of canal boats, were seen there in process of construction. They are built close to the bank of the Euphrates, of rough branches, never more than two or three inches thick, tied together into a frame, then covered with straw ropes, and pitched without and within with pitch. The bitumen is brought in baskets, on the backs of donkeys, from the bitumen springs two miles off, where it rises to the surface of the salt water. It is then heated in rude fumaces over a fire fed with bitumen, then mixed with sand, and is spread hot over the straw, making a strong, firm boat, the chief boat used on the river. A smaller boat is made perfectly round, like a tub, and large enough to hold about two men.

On the Use of καὶ in Hebrews x. 38.

BY PROF. D. R. GOODWIN, D.D., LL.D.

The verse reads as follows (Tisch.):

"Ο δὲ δίκαιος μου ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται, καὶ εἰν ὑποστειλήται, οὐκ εἰδοκεὶ ὡς ψυχὴ μου ἐν αὐτῷ.

This is a citation from the Septuagint of Habakkuk ii. 4, which reads as follows (Vat. Ms.):

"Εὰν ὑποστειλήται οὐκ εἰδοκεὶ ἡ ψυχὴ μου ἐν αὐτῷ, δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως μοι ζήσεται.

The passage consists of two clauses. In the first εἰν, κ.τ.λ., our present Hebrew text and the Septuagint are hopelessly irreconcilable. In the second clause, δὲ δίκαιος, κ.τ.λ., the Hebrew has "the just shall live by his faith, or his firm confidence, or (as some would render) by his faithfulness"; the Septuagint has, "the just shall live by my faith (i.e., by faith in me)"; and the epistle to the Hebrews has, "the just shall live by faith," or, as Tischendorf reads, "thy just man shall live by faith."

In making his citation the writer to the Hebrews has transposed the two clauses. As the text stands in the Septuagint, ὁ δίκαιος, "the just," cannot furnish the subject for ἴποστειληται, "draw back," for he is not mentioned till afterwards. Does he furnish that subject in the epistle? If so, the writer of the epistle has imported an entirely new term into his citation, which is neither in the Hebrew nor the Septuagint text, in both which "the just," etc., closes the passage. If he had intended to do so, would he not certainly have used δὲ, "but," for his connective rather than καὶ, "and"? It is remarkable that the A.V. has translated this καὶ by "but," and that, as it were, by an instinctive oversight, if I may so say; for they felt that the two clauses were to be interpreted or still set over against each other even after they had removed the chief reason for the antithesis by furnishing a new subject for "draw back." If "the just man" is supposed to furnish the subject for "draw back," the adversative conjunction would seem to be required as a matter of course. The prophet, too, having the clauses in the inverse order, still holds them as antithetic, and connects them by δὲ before δίκαιος.

Nevertheless the epistle uses καὶ for connecting the clauses. But it is to be noted that this particle really forms no part of the citation from the prophet, and that it is made to connect the same clauses, transposed, which he had connected by the adversative δὲ.

If, then, this is to be treated as a citation from the prophet, is it not clear that the two clauses are cited as independent propositions, and are joined together in the epistle by the writer's own καὶ (and)? so that we should read thus: "Now the just shall live by faith," and, "if (a man) draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

The Westminster revisers have treated this as a citation; but they have printed the "and" as if it were a part of the citation, which it is not. Yet in the case of several other citations they have recognized the use of "and" just suggested, as at St. Luke iv. 11, and in this very epistle at i. 10.

As to the subject of "draw back," we have seen that "the just man" cannot furnish it if the sense of the prophet is retained; and the insertion of the indefinite "one," or "any one," or "a man," has the authority of the revisers in frequent instances, as at John viii. 44, marg.; 2 Cor. viii. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 16, etc.

The interpretation of the καὶ here suggested is the more likely to be the true one, as the writer of this epistle immediately proceeds to contrast those "who draw back" with those who have faith, "who believe, to the saving of the soul."
The Use of ἢπειρ in the New Testament.

BY PROF. D. R. GOODWIN, D.D., LL.D.

This preposition, like the English "for,"—which is throughout its best representative, and which I shall here use in its stead—has a remarkable variety of meanings, or rather of divergent applications. For examples: "Christ died for us," and, "for our sins," a very different relation; and so again, "pray for them that persecute you," and, "we pray you for Christ"; and again, "praying for you," and, "giving thanks for you," and "giving thanks for all things." But amidst all this variety, one negative rule may be noted in passing: this preposition is never employed before a word designating what is conceived merely as existing uncertainly in the future, as an object of desire or hope. It seems always to refer to a datum or ground to rest upon. We may give thanks not only for (ἵπειρ) persons but for (ἵπειρα) things which have been received, Eph. v. 20. But, while we may pray for (ἵπειρ) persons, this preposition is never used in praying for a thing desired, as for grace, or faith, or daily bread.

It may also be observed in passing, that, in the expressions, "my body given for you," "my blood shed for you," both St. Luke and St. Paul use ἢπειρα; but St. Matthew uses the sacrificial πειρα, the preposition which the Septuagint almost always use to express atonement for; St. Mark too uses ἢπειρα, which Lachmann changes to ἢπαιρα. In Romans viii. 3 we have πειρα, where the authorized version translates, "sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin"—Marg. "by a sacrifice for sin"; and the revised version reads, "as an offering for sin."

I proceed now to show that this preposition ἢπειρ in the New Testament, just like the English for, may mean, and sometimes must mean, "instead of," a sense which is not unknown in classical Greek. "That one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." Here is life for life,—dying for the people's good, no doubt, but also in their stead, that they might not perish. So also, "who for my life laid down their own necks." So also, and still more clearly, "Who gave himself a ransom for all" (ἀντιλυτρών ἢπειρα), 1 Tim. ii. 6; for which our Lord had said unequivocally λυτρών ἀντὶ πολλῶν, "a ransom instead of many."

In 2 Cor. v. 20, ἢπειρα can scarcely mean anything else but "instead of": "For Christ, then, are we ambassadors,—we pray you for Christ," must mean "in his stead" or "as his representatives." It cannot mean "in his behalf" in the sense of "for his good or behalf." The Apostle says: "For Christ we are ambassadors, as God did beseech you by us; we pray you for Christ."

And still more clearly, if possible, is this the meaning of ἐπὶ in Philemon 13: "That for thee he might minister to me"; where the authorized version puts "instead of," and the revisers substitute "in behalf of." What was their motive in making this change it is not easy to say. But, if they intended to avoid the sense "instead of," they egregiously missed their aim; for "in behalf of" often has this very meaning, as when a chairman of a committee puts his name to a report "in behalf of the committee," i.e., certainly not for their sake, or for their good or benefit, but as their representative or substitute, by their authority,—simply in their stead. And, without having recourse to the authority of translators or revisers or lexicons, it is plain on the face of this passage that St. Paul would have Onesimus minister to him, not for the sake, the good, the benefit of Philemon, but as his representative or substitute,—in his stead.

When St. Peter says, 1 Pet. ii. 21, "Christ suffered for us, just for unjust," the contrast can hardly fail to suggest the sense of substitution. For, if the sense be merely "for the sake of," "for the good of," then what is there strange or striking in the just suffering for the unjust? It would be still more remarkable if the unjust were to volunteer to suffer for the good of the unjust. Good men often labor and toil for the good of the criminal class, but criminals rarely trouble themselves about it. Besides, why should it be of any special advantage to the unjust that he who suffers, who dies, for them should himself be just? If the suffering of "just for unjust" has in it any point, it would seem necessarily to involve the idea of substitution,—of some value, worth, or merit of the just, set over against the unworthiness and demerit of the unjust.

Thus, I think, it has been shown that ἐπὶ (for) in the New Testament may mean, and sometimes must mean, "instead of." But it is never to be forgotten that, while the sense "instead of" does not exclude the sense "for the sake of" or "because of," no more do these last senses exclude that of "instead of"; so that all the passages in which Christ is said to suffer or die or shed his blood for our sins, while they mean "because of our sins," may also mean "because of, as being a sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for our sins"; and those which speak of Christ as suffering, dying, or shedding his blood for us, while they mean "for our sake," and "for our good," may also mean "on our behalf," in the way of being our substitute and representative,—in our stead.
