Jacob's Blessing:

BY PROF. J. P. PETERS, PH.D.

In studying commentaries on Hebrew prophets and poets I have often been astonished at the amount of effort expended in the attempt to determine which of two or more permissible renderings of an obscure or equivocal passage was the correct one. It has seemed to me that the obscurity of the greater number of these passages, and their peculiar constructions, — which are the despair of grammarians, — are due to the intention of the writer to play on words, either saying two things at once, or saying one thing and insinuating another. Such a playing on words is characteristic of Arabic poetry, and, however frivolous and unworthy it may seem to us, to orientals it appears sufficiently forcible and dignified to be used on the most solemn occasions. New Testament commentators have recognized a large number of such plays on words, but in the Old Testament, where they abound probably to a far greater extent, and especially in the prophets and poets, they have been, for the most part, disregarded. The first chapter of the prophet Micah is a curious and unmistakable instance of this playing upon words; but, on the whole, the best example of a sustained playing upon words which I have observed in the Old Testament is the so-called Blessing of Jacob, Gen. xlix. The object of this paper is to point out some of the word-plays in that poem, and to make a few suggestions regarding its date, as determined by its allusions to historical events. But, first, it is necessary to say that the very possibility of such playing on words as we have in the Old Testament is conditioned on an unpointed text. A pointed text must, of necessity, adopt one reading to the exclusion of the others. Such passages ought, therefore, to be studied with little or no regard for the Massoretic pointing,—a rule which I shall apply in the present instance.

3. רִאָם בּכְרִי | אֶחָד כּהֶרֶת | וּרְאָשְׁתָּאָו.
     יְרָע שֵׁאת | יִרָע טֵן;
     פֹּחַ חַמָּה אָלָחֶר.
     נָי עַלְּתָה | מַשְׁכָּבָה אֶאֶל.
     אָוָא חֶלְלֶת יְתוָא עַלְּתָה.
3. Reuben — my first-born, thou art my strength, and firstling of my manly power;
Superabundance of lifting up, and superabundance of force;
4. Bubbling over like water, abound not;
For thou ascendedst thy father's bed;
Then defiledst thou: my couch he ascended.

This is the ordinary translation; but the second line is quite capa-bable of another rendering, and the force of the whole is lost unless this second meaning also be perceived. Pointing as רְשָׁעָה the word which the Massoretes have pointed רְשָׁעָה, we can translate lines 2 and 3 thus: —

Remnant of destruction, and remnant of violence;
Bubbling over like water remain not.

This is an interpretation of the consonant text at least as admissible, in itself considered, as that of the Massoretes. רְשָׁעָה רְשָׁעָה is a phrase for the description of the first-born, used in Deut. xxi. 17, and to him belong the rights of primogeniture (משותפְּוֹן). Those rights are there defined as being two shares (משותפִּים), a double portion, of all his father's possessions. These two shares are represented in our passage by the repetition of רְשָׁעָה; one share being רְשָׁעָה רְשָׁעָה, and the other רְשָׁעָה רְשָׁעָה. To the first-born should belong a great blessing, in two portions. In reality, Reuben practically vanished from among the tribes of Israel. Accordingly, the words used have a double sense, as above pointed out. If we turn to the LXX. we find an evidence in the translation σκληρός φρέσοθατ καὶ σκληρός αἰθώδης that the Greek translators perceived in the words another sense than that of blessing. The Peshito renders: —

Remnant of lifting up, and remnant of might;
Thou didst dissolve like water, thou abidest not.

This rendering brings out the force of the comparison with water, namely, that Reuben was dissolved like water, which has no cohesion.
If now we turn to the history of Reuben, we find primogeniture everywhere ascribed to him, the word רְשָׁעָה being used over and over with reference to him. In the stories of Joseph, and of Dathan and Abiram, we find a recognition of, or reference to, this same primorganiture. In the Song of Deborah (Jud. v. 15) Reuben is represented as in existence, but holding aloof from his brethren; later, the tribe disappears from history. In the Mesha stone (850 B.C.)
we find Reuben's land largely, if not altogether, in the possession of Moab. The same conditions also existed at the time of Isaiah, if Isa. xv., xvi. reflect the conditions of the time of that prophet. If we turn to the Blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 6), we read:—

Let Reuben live and not die,
Nor be his men a few!

This seems to show that at the time of the composition of Deut. xxxiii. 6 Reuben had practically ceased to exist, in which that passage is in entire accord with Gen. xlix. 3, 4, as I understand the intention of those verses.¹

5.  שמעון ולו アות
כי חסם מרתרה:
６.  מסר אל יבנה נמיי
פּהלְמָא אל חור בְּברַי
כי באתה חגר יי
והרַצום עקוד שור:

7.  ואתר אפס כי עני
עכברת כי קשה
אלהים בינקט
ואפגים בישראל;

5. Simeon and Levi—brethren;
Instruments of oppression their swords.
6. Into their circle enter not, my soul,
With their congregation unite not, mine honor;
For in their wrath they slew men,
And in their kindness hamstrung cattle.
7. Cursed be their anger, for it was violent,
And their fury, for it was harsh.
I divide them in Jacob,
And scatter them in Israel.

¹ With regard to the last two words of v. 4, יאדו, I feel satisfied neither as to pointing or translation. According to the laws of parallelism, and according to Massoretic usage elsewhere, we should expect יאדו. It seems, also, as though we should have a noun following it. In this and the following passages I have not deemed it advisable to stop to discuss poetical structure, but have tried to arrange the lines so as best to bring out the various rhymes, both final and medial.
This translation of v. 5 is a tradition, as to the correctness of which there is much uncertainty; LXX. reads 'יַכֶּל instead of 'יַכֶּל, and connects בַּר נַחֲרֵת יִרְדָּה with בִּלְבֵל, to cut, treating the ב as preposition prefixed. In this latter respect Peshito agrees with LXX. The whole passage seems to refer to the story of Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.), and a hostile animus towards Levi is manifest. In v. 6 the word יִשִּׁי appears to have been chosen with special and sarcastic reference to the functions of the tribe of Levi, and the Levitical use of the word יִשִּׁי. The latter half of that verse seems to point to the contrast between the murderous conduct of Levi in the story of Dinah, and the priestly function which he claimed among the tribes. Accordingly, יִשִּׁי אָנָא seems to me a satirical and bitter reference to the sacrificial functions peculiar to Levi. Their part was in gracious and peaceful worship to sacrifice unto Jehovah, but instead they slaughtered men in violence, and destroyed their possessions. Similarly, v. 7 gives a satirical and bitter explanation of the fact that Levi had no inheritance in Israel, connecting it with the bloody deed wrought at Shechem. Throughout these verses, it will be observed, Simeon is merely a lay-figure; the animosity is directed against Levi. These verses breathe strongly the spirit of the northern kingdom, or Samaria (cf. 1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Chron. xi. 13-15). It is interesting to compare with this the corresponding passage in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 8-11). That is indeed a blessing. So far as allusions to the past are concerned, it is founded on the incidents recorded concerning Moses and Aaron at Massah and Meribah, and the action of the whole tribe against the worshippers of the golden calf (Ex. xxxii. 27, 29). With relation to the present, it refers to the Levites as the guardians of the covenant, the teachers of the law, and the sacrificers for the whole people. In its present form, Simeon is left out of the Blessing of Moses, but Heilprin, in his Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews, following Graetz, who, in his turn, follows Rabbi Eliezer, “a Talmudical authority of the second century of the Christian era,” proposes to substitute Simeon for Judah. This would place Simeon in his natural order immediately after Reuben. The verse (Deut. xxxiii. 7) would then contain an intelligible word-play on the name Simeon. At present, it reads:—

Hear, Jehovah, Judah’s voice,
And bring him unto his people.
This does not seem applicable to Judah, but is applicable to Simeon. If this amendment be adopted,—and it certainly is an enticing one,—we shall have in both Blessings the same picture of Simeon’s condition, namely, that he was a lost tribe. But this change, according to Heilprin, involves a second change in order that Judah be not omitted altogether. He would, accordingly, transpose the latter part of v. 7, placing it immediately before v. 11, thus depriving Levi’s blessing of its incongruous military suffix. Judah’s blessing would thus follow that of Levi, as in the Blessing of Jacob. Beginning with the word וְיִשְׂרָאֵל, as a play on the name of Judah, it would read:—

Judah,—with his hands he fought for himself;
And an aid against his foes art thou.
Bless, Jehovah, his might,
And accept his handiwork.
Crush the loins of his opponents,
And his haters, that they rise not.

This gives a much more satisfactory sense, which does not, however, necessarily prove the correctness of the emendation.

8. יְרָוֵת אַתָּה/וְיָדְךָ עִזָּךְ יָמְרוּ/יַעָצַף לְשׁוֹנְךָ יָמְרוּ/יִשְׂרָאֵל לְבֵינֵיכֶם.

9. תְּפֹאָה יְדוֹת/גְּדוֹלָה כֹּל עָלָיו/מָשָׂא בְּנָהָיו/וּפָעְלוֹ בְּנָהָיו/וּכְלוֹא מֶמְזָוֵה.

10. לֹא יִמְצָא שְׁפַט מֵימָדוּר/וְמָהֲקֶכָּנָה מִבֵּית רְבֵית/עַד כִּמְאָא שָמַךְ/וּלִי יֵהֵד זֵעָם/אָסָר לָפָה/וּלְשֹׁרֵחַ בְּנִי אַתָּה/כֹּכָּב בְּיָמְךָ לַמְשָׁה/וּבֵרָם עֲנֵיָם שַׁפַּה/יְבַלִּיל יׇיְיֵי מִזְיֵן.

12. יַהֲנֶךְ מָהֲלוָלְךָ.
The first play on the name Judah in the word נדָנְדִי is the same as in Gen. xxix. 35. There is also a second play on the name in דָּנִי, which is the same as in Deut. xxxiii. 7. The reference to the lion in v. 9 gains force if one can suppose the lion to have been the emblem and standard of the tribe of Judah, and similarly, as will appear later, the references in the case of Ephraim gain force if we can suppose the bull to have been the emblem or standard of that tribe. Both of these, it will be observed, are cherubic emblems. In v. 10 the parallelism with נַכְבַּד נַכְבַּד compels us to understand נֵכְבַּד as a neuter,—staff, and not ruler. Similarly, in Num. xxi. 18, we find it used as a synonymous parallel to מְשִׁיחַ גְּדוֹל. In the word מְשִׁיחַ lurking the second sense "tribe." As to the translation of the words מְשִׁיחַ נַכְבַּד, it cannot be denied that, grammatically, the rendering "until Shiloh come" is possible. To make this rendering intelligible, however, it appears to be necessary to regard Shiloh as a mystical name for Messiah, for which no argument outside of the passage itself can be produced. Furthermore, if this rendering be adopted, we then find the passage in direct conflict with the facts of history, for the sceptre departed from Judah long before He came whom we hold to be Messiah; and the Jews believe Messiah is not yet come. Kalisch would render: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet,—even when they come to Shiloh,—and to him shall be submission of the nations." His rendering of נַכְבַּד נַכְבַּד seems to me hard...
ing of the historical allusion in הָיָה I believe to be correct. Dillmann understands the historical allusion in הָיָה to be to the transfer of the “central point of the congregation and of the Tabernacle from Gilgal to Shiloh.” He would, then, make Judah the subject of אֲבִי, and also the noun referred to by the pronoun הָיָה. But Judah never possessed the sceptre until the time of David. Dillmann refers to the fact that Judah stood in the first line in battle, and that he went up first to battle against the Canaanites. Admitting these as historical facts, the man must be hard pushed to prove a foregone conclusion who will adduce them as sufficient evidence that Judah was the sceptre-bearer. It is the difficulty which they have found in explaining the allusion in הָיָה that has led Dillmann and others to do such violence to the plain facts of history. From before the conquest to the time of Saul, Ephraim, and not Judah, possessed or claimed a sort of hegemony, which was, during that period, the nearest approach to sceptre-bearing. After Moses’ death, Joshua the Ephraimite became the leader of the people. Ephraim, his tribe, assumed the hegemony, and accordingly the central sanctuary was located at Shiloh, within the territory of that tribe. During the anarchical period of the Judges we find at least two distinct claims to hegemony on the part of Ephraim, once over against Gideon (Jud. viii. 1), and once over against Jephthah (Jud. xii. 1). Judah became the leading and ruling tribe only through the prowess of David. Its rule continued unbroken until the beginning of the reign of Rehoboam, when, at a great parliament held at Shechem, the majority of the tribes, under the leadership of Jeroboam, an Ephraimite, revolted, and set up a new kingdom. We should expect, in connection with a reference to the departure of the sceptre, or of tribes—for the double sense should be borne in mind—from Judah, an allusion to this parliament of Shechem. Does such an allusion lie in the words of the text? Heilprin, in his Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews, calls attention to the fact that Samuel ben Meir, “a sagacious rabbinical commentator of the twelfth century,” had remarked “that the name Shechem, in connection with Rehoboam, as elsewhere in connection with Joshua, stands exceptionally for Shiloh, which was but a few hours’ walk south of it.” Heilprin holds “that the place intended to be indicated, here and there, was a great national camping-ground between the two towns, generally called after Shiloh.” Kalisch maintains substantially the same view.

Perhaps I cannot better arrange the proof of the identity of the place of assembly referred to as Shiloh with that referred to as Shechem, than by quoting Heilprin once more. "We read in the book of Joshua (xviii. 1) that, on the conquest of Canaan, ‘the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there’; that their camp remained ‘at Shiloh’ (xviii. 9); that Joshua, dividing the conquered land between the tribes, ‘cast lots for them at Shiloh, before Jehovah’ (xviii. 10); that when the report came that the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh had built an altar east of the Jordan, ‘the whole congregation assembled at Shechem to go to war against them’ (xxii. 10–12); and, after all this, that ‘Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem,’ and that there their elders, chiefs, judges, and officers ‘presented themselves before God’ (xxiv. 1); that ‘Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance at Shechem,’ and to commemorate the covenant, ‘took a great stone and set it up there, under an oak that was by Jehovah’s sanctuary’ (xxiv. 25, 26). In all this latter narrative Shechem evidently stands for Shiloh, for at Shiloh was ‘Jehovah’s sanctuary’ under Joshua.” The proof here presented seems to me absolute, unless a man wish to assume two sanctuaries of Jehovah, one at Shechem, the other at Shiloh. Of the history of Shiloh during the period of the Judges, it is scarcely necessary to remind any one, excepting, perhaps, that the camp was there on occasion of the Benjamite war (Jud. xxi. 12). It is interesting to note that Abijah the prophet, who was in a sense the cause of Jeroboam’s revolt, came from Shiloh, and that Jeroboam “built” Shechem as his capital. The proximity of Shechem, thus raised to new importance, while the old sanctuary of Shiloh was but a name of the past, naturally, in course of time, led to the use of the name of Shechem as the designation of the national camping-ground instead of Shiloh, which latter designation lingered only in a few instances. 1 To me, accordingly, the passage (Gen. xlix. 10) †אש יִפְרוּר יְמִיָּם ... לִלְא יִפְרָו seems to refer to the revolt against Judæan supremacy successfully conducted by Jeroboam. Jeroboam is, then, in thought the subject of נב. With 1 It is worth while to call attention in this connection to the story of Abimelech, and the existence near Shechem of “an oak” (Jud. ix. 6), such as that alluded to in Josh. xxiv. 25, 26, and also, in or by Shechem, of a sanctuary of an El (Jud. ix. 46) or Baal (Jud. ix. 4) of the Covenant. The relation established between Shiloh and Shechem may help to explain these references in the story of Abimelech.

v. 11 the reference to Judah is resumed, and the remaining two verses describe the luxuriance and abundance in which Judah and Jerusalem revelled.

13. Zebulun—at the coast of the sea he dwelleth,
      And he is a coast for ships,
      And his side is toward Zidon.

Here there is a play on the root-meaning of בֵּית (inner-chamber), to dwell. The same play occurs in Gen. xxx. 20, and, in addition, a play on the similarity of sound between בֵּית and בֵּית. In the Blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 19, 20) there seems to be a play on the similarity of sound between בֵּית and בֵּית. Our verse gives Zebulun a seacoast (Jud. v. 17 uses the same words of Asher), contrary to Josh. xix. 10–16, and the reference to Zidon seems to show that it was on the Mediterranean. On the other hand, the Blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19), where Issachar and Zebulun are mentioned together as enjoying the treasures of the sea, as also the reference to the deportation by Tiglath-pileser in Isa. viii. 23 and 2 Kings xv. 29, seems to show that Zebulun bordered on the sea of Galilee. It is noticeable that both here and in Deut. xxxiii. the order of Gen. xxx. has been reversed, and Zebulun placed before Issachar.

14. Issachar—a bony ass,
      Crouching among the pens.

15. For he saw rest, that it was good,
      And the land, that it was pleasant;
      And he bowed his shoulder to burdens,
      And became one paying tribute.
There is, as concerns the name, possibly a recognition of the same play on words as in Gen. xxx. 16-18, but this is very doubtful. The same reproach which in Jud. v. 16 is directed against Reuben is here directed against Issachar, and the same singular word, מַשְׁפִּיטֵהוּ, מָנַהוּ, is used in both places. In v. 15 there is the second sense, "tribute," as indicated.

16. Dan judges his people like one of the tribes of Israel.
17. Be Dan a serpent on the road, a viper on the path, Striking the horse's heels, that his rider falleth backward.

18. For thy salvation have I waited, Jehovah.

The play on the name is the same as in Gen. xxx. 6. So far as historical allusions are concerned, our verse seems to point to a period when Dan was quite insignificant in point of strength and numbers, and to a time when it lay on the road by which invasions threatened Israel. In other words, it points to a time after the removal to Laish, and before the first Assyrian deportation, or even before the Syrian conquests of the time of Jehu. Jud. v. 17, on the other hand, belongs to a period when Dan still dwelt on the Philistine seacoast. Deut. xxxiii. 22 agrees with our passage as to the dwelling-place of the tribe. It reads: "and of Dan he said: Dan is a lion's whelp; he springeth from Bashan." I have placed v. 18 in brackets because it does not seem to me to belong to the original poem, but to be rather a pious ejaculation or prayer added or inserted later. For a somewhat similar case, compare Isa. ii. 22.

19. Gad — a squad invadeth him, And he cutteth their heel.

The sound certainly dominates the sense in this verse, and I doubt whether we should look for any political or historical allusions, excepting only a general reference to the Arab forays, to which the geographical position of the tribe peculiarly exposed it. The play on words in Gen. xxx. 11 is different, and not very intelligible. The blessing in Deut. xxxiii. 20, 21 is of an entirely different character.
It is largely based, apparently, on the story of the conquest, or else, as Heilprin thinks, a reference to the conquest has been attached to the original blessing. In Jud. v. 17 Gad is rebuked for taking no part in Barak’s uprising.

20.

הוחת יצז מעדני מלך

Asher — fat his food, 1

For he yieldeth royal dainties.

The play upon the name in Gen. xxx. 13 thinks of שמר as having the root-meaning “bless.” Both here and in Deut. xxxiii. 24 the same signification of the tribal name is in the mind of the writer, and is applied to the richness of the land and its products. We know almost nothing of the history of this tribe; only we learn from Jud.
i. 31, 32 that, so far from conquering the land where it dwelt, it simply went in and dwelt among the Canaanites; and from Jud. v. 17 that it took no part in Barak’s uprising.

21.

נפתלי יאלל שלמה

In this verse there is no reference to the play on the name in Gen.
xxx. 8. There is, moreover, no play here on the meaning of the name, but merely a species of alliteration in the repetition as the prominent letter of the two following words of the final letter, י, of נפתלי. Deut. xxxiii. 23 agrees with our verse only in representing Naphtali as highly blessed and prosperous,—a condition certainly not existing when the eighth chapter of Isaiah was written. As to the translation of our passage, according to the Massoretic pointing it must mean:—

Naphtali — a hind let loose,
That giveth goodly words.

What the allusion is in this case is not clear. LXX. seem to have read ηναφταλι for יאלל, and ηναφταλι for יאלל. Substituting this pointing, the verse would read:—

1 I have assumed, with commentators in general, that the ה prefixed by the Massoretes to this verse properly forms the close of the preceding verse.
Naphtali—a terebinth stretched out,
That yieldeth boughs of beauty.

This makes a reading more consistent with itself than that of the Massoretes. The thought of this verse might readily have been suggested by the position of Naphtali, which flourished by the Sea of Galilee, as a tree flourishes by the water. Dillmann suggests that the term "stretched out" is applied on account of the shape of Naph­tali's territory; but I doubt whether any but a modern scholar, with a map before him, could have reached such an idea. It seems to me that the word שֵׁלַחַה is chosen for its letter, and because otherwise it will serve well enough to express fertility and a goodly growth.

It is customary to explain בֶּן פְּרָתִים in the first line as the feminine participle of בֵּן פְּרָת, equivalent to בָּרָנָה, and meaning "fruit-bear­ing," i.e., "tree." The passage is th
22. JACOB'S BLESSING.

Fruitful (son of a tree) is Joseph,
Fruitful, by a fountain,
Branches (daughters) run over the wall.

In the play on the name Ephraim in Gen. xli. 52 it is connected with the root יָרָה, “fruit”; but in the book of Hosea we meet with a double play on the name Ephraim, as connected with the root יָרָה, or with the root בָּלָה, “bull.” So in Hosea xiv. 2 we have, apparently, a double sense given for the word בֵּית, carrying out this double word-play. There is a similar double play on the name בֵּית in the first three lines of our passage. In their second sense we may render those three lines as follows:—

A bullock (son of a cow) is Joseph.
A bullock by a fountain;
Daughters have marched in procession to a bull.

In confirmation of this second rendering, we may cite Deut. xxxiii. 17, where Ephraim is designated as Joseph’s first-born “bull,” with a play also on the word for first-born.

His first-born bullock,—glory is his,
The horns of a mountain ox his horns;
With them he thrusts peoples,
The ends of the earth likewise.

The part which the heifer or bullock plays, moreover, in Ephraim’s religious history is well known, and of itself inclines us to suspect, in the playing upon words and historical allusions in which this Blessing of Jacob abounds, some allusion to the similarity of בֵּית and בֵּית, and some reference to Ephraimite worship. The doubling of the phrase בֵּית seems to be an allusion to the dual form of בֵּית.

The word בֵּית, in line 2, than which the LXX. evidently read something else, may possibly be intended as a reference to that to which Amos and Hosea refer in יָשָׁה, where they apparently play on the words יָשָׁה and יָשָׁה. In line 3, יָשָׁה seems to be a feminine plural form, of the same formation as in Aramaic and Assyrian. The meaning of this word in the secondary translation is the regular meaning, rather than that given in the primary translation. In the secondary translation, "cow," and "ox." The remainder of our passage is full of difficulties, but they do not appear to be caused by word-plays.

23. But they dealt harshly, and contended with him, And persecuted him — the bowmen.

24. But his bow abideth ever, And supple are the muscles of his hands, Through the help of Jacob's strong-one Through the protection of Israel's Rock (?) ;

25. Through the God of thy father, that helpeth thee, And the Almighty, that blesseth thee, With blessings of the heavens above, Blessings of the deep spread out beneath, Blessings of breasts and womb.

26. Thy father's blessings — Which prevail above the bounties of the eternal mountains, The pleasant things of the everlasting hills — Come on Joseph's head, On the crown of the head of his brethren's prince.

The reference in verse 23f. seems to be both to the story of Joseph, as told in Genesis, and also to the oppression of Ephraim under Solomon, which finally led to Jeroboam's revolt. The last verse claims the hegemony for Ephraim as over against Judah, agreeing therein with the story of Joseph. The whole passage is conceived from the standpoint of Ephraim, and argues a north Israelite origin. Manasseh is not directly alluded to in the passage, appearing to be subordinated to Ephraim under the name Joseph. In verse 23, the Massoretes is a ἀπεξελεγμένον. Sam. and LXX. offer ἀπεξελεγμένον, which seems to suit the metre better, and does not involve the invention of a meaning. Line 9 does not seem to me possible in its present form. In order to leave no blank, I have translated what seems to me to be the general idea. Lines 12–19 find a valuable commentary in Deut. xxxiii. 13–16. In accordance with the external testimony of Deut. xxxiii. 15, as also of the internal testimony of the parallelism I have substituted in line 16, ἀπεξελεγμένον, and connected it with the preceding, instead of with the succeeding word.

27. בָּנִים זַבְּד יִשְׂרָאֵל בּוֹקָר יִשְׂרָאֵל יִשְׂרָאֵל הֶלְקָם יִשְׂרָאֵל;
If one might suppose the wolf to be the emblem of Benjamin, this passage would gain in force. The tribal characteristics here referred to are well exemplified in Jud. xix.–xxi., as also in the history of Saul. There is no allusion in this passage to the play on the name Benjamin in Gen. xxxv. 18. The tone of the passage is hostile; it is an un­friendly characterization of the history and attributes of the border tribe. In this it stands in marked contrast with Deut. xxxiii. 12, which is written from the standpoint of Jerusalem and the Temple. At the time of the latter, Benjamin has evidently become a mere adjunct of the stronger Judah, whose only distinction is that Jerusalem and the Temple are within his geographical limits.

A consideration of the historical and political allusions in the Blessing of Jacob seems to show that it is the composition of a poet of the northern kingdom at some time, probably, between the reigns of Jeroboam and Ahab. The Blessing of Moses belongs to a later period, when amicable relations existed between the two kingdoms, and is the work of a poet of the prophetic school in Judah, who believed in national union, and unity of worship at the Jerusalem temple. The standpoint of the author in time and opinion may be described as approximately that of the prophet Amos. It is not meant to assert, however, that these are necessarily the dates of composition of the various individual "blessings." The Blessing of Jacob especially is far from homogeneous in style or treatment. A comparison of the various "blessings" in Gen. xlix. and Deut. xxxiii. with corresponding passages in Jud. v. and Gen. xxx. seems to show that these tribal characterizations or "blessings" were of ancient origin. What was done by the authors of Gen. xlix. and Deut. xxxiii. was to work up such more ancient separate couplets into one complete poem, modifying and amplifying the same by those historical and political allusions which their time and standpoint suggested.

But, if the Blessing of Jacob be such as is here supposed, the question arises, how and when did it attain its present position in the sacred books of the Jews? Imbedded in the books of Kings is a long section, drawn from at least two literary works, which might be designated respectively as Tales of the Prophet Elijah, and Miracles of the Prophet Elisha. This section differs strikingly from the surrounding material, and was evidently drawn not from archives, but from collections of popular tales. Moreover, those collections of tales were evidently compositions or compilations of poets or narrators of the northern kingdom. The book of Judges again is a prose epic, consisting of a number of stories of the heroes of various tribes. It will be noticed, however, that no heroes of the tribe of Judah are included among those whose exploits are told in the body of this book. On the other hand, the editor of the book as we have it, manifestly did belong to the tribe, or at least the kingdom of Judah. So also the books of Amos and Hosea are concerned with, and belong to, the northern kingdom, although Amos himself was a native of Judah. But both of these books, as we have them, were edited in Judah. In the case of Amos, this is proved by vi. 2, a prose insertion in a lyrical passage, containing historical allusions which fix its date at about 711 B.C. In the case of Hosea, a Judean editing is shown by the method of insertion of the references to Judah and Jerusalem. For example: in v. 13, although the name of Judah is introduced, yet the context concerns only Ephraim or Israel. This is one of many instances which go to show that the references to Judah are not of the essence of the book, but belong rather to the editing. It has seemed to me not improbable that the book was edited by Hosea himself for Hezekiah’s library. Solomon’s Song is another example of the literary compositions of the northern kingdom. A considerable portion of the most interesting, and, from a literary point of view, most artistic of the patriarchal stories have a similar origin. Some of these stories, moreover, contain historical and political allusions kindred to those contained in the Blessing of Jacob. Indeed, for the preservation of ancient legends and folklore, we seem to be especially indebted to the poets and narrators of the northern kingdom.

Without entering into a discussion of the books of Samuel or of the Psalms, several of which latter, and notably those two to the tune of The Lilies (xliv., lxxx.), seem to me to belong to the northern kingdom, I think it evident that in the first half of the eighth century B.C. the northern kingdom rather than the southern was the seat of literary, intellectual, and prophetical activity. The intellectual life which had begun in the days of David and Solomon perished with the great rebellion, to be revived later in the northern kingdom, where the conditions of national life were more favorable to such a revival than at Jerusalem. The fall of Samaria acted upon Judah as the capture of Constantinople acted upon Italy. Israelites sought refuge in Judah, bringing with them literary treasures and intellectual activity.
The result was a renaissance, and the age of Hezekiah became the golden age of Hebrew literature.

In Prov. xxv. 1 we are told that "the men of Hezekiah translated," or transcribed, or wrote down "proverbs of Solomon." Here is an effort to collect and preserve the literary treasures of the past. The account of the step-clock in 2 Kings xx. 11 serves to show that Assyrian culture and civilization had already begun to make themselves felt in Judah. The account of Ahaz' altar in 2 Kings xvi. 10 points in the same direction. It is not unnatural to suppose that the writing down of Solomon's proverbs was for the purposes of a library in Jerusalem such as the Assyrian kings had long since begun to collect at Nineveh. I have already pointed out that the book of Amos was edited somewhere about 711 B.C., apparently for this library. The first twelve chapters of Isaiah form a collection by themselves, quite separate from the rest of the book. Whereas chapters xiii.-xxxix. are a conglomerate, thrown together without order or arrangement, chapters i.-xii. form an orderly and complete compilation, comprising some six or seven independent sections or chapters, and yet, over against the following chapters, constituting both in arrangement and contents one book. Now these chapters contain only prophecies concerning Judah and Jerusalem, all of which were delivered, according to Cheyne, not later than about 711 B.C. That is to say, this book (Isa. i.-xii.) was edited about the same time as Amos. I suppose Hosea and Micah also to have been edited about this time and for the same purpose, namely, for Hezekiah's library. It was the formation of this library at just this time, and the desire, as shown in Prov. xxv. 1, to collect and preserve all the literary remains of the past, which led to the collection and preservation of so much of the literature of the northern kingdom but lately brought into Judah by the Israelite émigrés. No tales of the valor of heroes of Judah, no Judean folklore antedating the time of David, has been handed down to us; this literature belonged to the northern kingdom. Literary and antiquarian zeal led to the collection and reception of these northern tales and poems into Hezekiah's library in spite of their occasional unfriendly allusions to Judah, and once received into that library, their use in historical works, owing to the awakened zeal for a knowledge of the past, was assured. So with the transference of intellectual activity from Samaria a new era begins in Judah, and soon the charming tales and poems of the north, preserved in the library of Hezekiah, begin to be woven into the more solid and ambitious works of the historians and lawyers of Jerusalem.
This literary awakening could not fail to act on the priests. They were the custodians of those ancient religious and legal traditions which, coming down from the age of Moses, had grown with, and been modified by, changing times and conditions. While some parts of the "law" were written, presumably the larger part of it was handed down mainly by word of mouth. Moreover, that which was written probably existed in various independent codes relating to different subjects. Some of these—such as a tariff of offerings, or tables of civil and criminal law, like those contained in the Book of the Covenant—may have been published, or set up at the Temple gates where they could be read by the worshippers. The greater part of the "law," however, seems to have been the exclusive, if not esoteric, possession of the priesthood of the Jerusalem temple. The literary activity of the renaissance made itself felt within the circle of the priests, leading them to begin to commit to writing their unwritten law as well as ancient traditions, customs, and ceremonies. Thus was commenced the work which has given us the middle books of the Pentateuch, as well as much of Genesis and Joshua.

But besides the merely literary activity of the period, a strong prophetical or religio-ethical movement also made itself felt. Centering about the Jerusalem temple, demanding unity of worship (2 Kings xviii. 3, 4) as one of the necessary conditions of the purity of the religion of Jehovah, and as a component part of the Mosaic revelation, this movement endeavored to impart to the people at large the semi-esoteric "law" of the priesthood. The result of this attempt to instruct the people in the law of Moses, especially on its ethical side,—as it affected their life, not as it affected the details of priestly ritual,—to apply it to their actual needs and conditions, to force it on their conscience and belief by exhortation, and by the story of its original promulgation, was the book of Deuteronomy, which, as it seems to me, was a product of the age of Hezekiah.

Such are the chief speculations suggested to my mind by a careful study and analysis of the Blessing of Jacob.
