nothing new to be noted in comparison with the uses of the LXX nor any change of signification. The meaning remains, the application is different.

Thus it would appear that from end to end of the Scriptures there is evidence that the relation of God to his people or to the individual was expressly regarded as one recognizing and indeed based upon a relatively but not wholly dependent will on the human side. Contrariwise, there is no evidence of any tendency even to regard that relation in any true or exact sense of the term 'servile'. The most favoured terminology was one which regarded that relation as above all analogous to that between a tutor and his pupil or a guardian and his ward. To sum up, it may be repeated that this relation is throughout distinguished from (a) that of an owner to his estate or land, (b) that of a father or procreator to his children, (c) that of a king to his subjects. The English 'lord' leaves several of them in indistinction from one another.

THE ANAPHORA OF THEODORE

Leontius of Byzantium reckons it among the offences of Theodore of Mopsuestia that he improvised an Anaphora different from that handed down to the churches, neither reverencing that of the Apostles—presumably the 'Clementine'—nor taking account of that of S. Basil; and he adds that Theodore 'filled the rite full of blasphemies' (that is, Nestorianisms). The Syriac Anaphora of Theodore the Interpreter, which is used by the Nestorians for about a third part of the year, is both obviously and according to tradition translated from the Greek; but opinion has varied as to whether or not this version represents the Anaphora alluded to by Leontius and the authentic work of Theodore. Renaudot, through whose Latin version Theodore first became known in the West (Litt. orient. coll. ii p. 577), was unable to find in it the alleged 'blasphemies' and concluded that it is not the Anaphora known to Leontius. G. S. Assemani (B.O. iii 2 p. 228) replied by pointing out a passage (xiii below) which might suffice to explain Leontius's charge. Le Brun (Explication xi 10) regards Theodore as the rite of Mopsuestia, but doubts whether it is what Leontius refers to,

1 c. Nest. et Eutych. iii 19 (Migne P. G. lxxxvi 1368 c) ἀναφορὰν γὰρ σχεδιάζει ἵπτεραν παρὰ τὴν πατρίδαν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις παραδοσιῶν, μήτε τὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων αἰδεθείς, μήτε δὲ τὴν τοῦ μεγάλου Βασιλείου ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ πνεύματι συγγραφείσαν λόγον τινὸς κριῶν ἀξίαν. ἐν τῇ ἀναφορᾷ βλασφημίων, οὐ γὰρ εὐχῶν, τελετὴν ἀνεπλήρωσεν.
unless perchance, writing against the Nestorians, he has 'exaggerated their faults'. For Palmer (Origines Liturg., ed. 1845, i p. 196), Theodore and Nestorius 'seem to have few claims to primitive antiquity', and Leontius's story 'does not prove the genuineness' of Theodore, which also 'seems improbable' on other (scarcely serious) grounds. Neale (Eastern Church i p. 334) holds that the Anaphora 'may fairly be attributed to Theodore'; and Swete expresses his agreement with Neale, adding that 'both thought and language bear the impress of Theodore's mind' (Dict. Christian Biog. iv p. 943). This judgement, coming from such a source, may be regarded as decisive; and the purpose of the present Note is to collect some at least of the evidence on which it may be supposed to rest.

The greater part of any fully developed liturgy is likely to be common form, and marks of individual authorship are only to be looked for in occasional features, whether of dogmatic statement or of characteristic or favourite phraseology; and of this kind the Anaphora seems to have in common with the undisputed works of Theodore as much as could well be expected and enough fairly to establish its authenticity.

In the following notes I use, with some modifications, the anonymous translation (The Liturgy of the holy apostles Adai and Mari, &c., S.P.C.K. 1893) of the Syriac Liturgia sanctorum apostolorum Adaei et Maris, &c., Urmiae 1890, and the references are to page and line of the translation followed by those of the text itself in square brackets.

I. It is almost enough to run the eye casually over Theodore's pages to notice the singular frequency of (1) ἡ χάρις τοῦ ἀγίου Πνεύματος (which does not occur in N.T.); (2) τὸ μέγεθος, magnitudo, of this and that; (3) ἐπιμέλεια, κηδεμονία, and cognates: cura, sollicitudo, diligentia. It is needless to give references in detail: it is sufficient to note that, e.g., in about 165 lines of 8vo pages of the commentary on Joel, outside of the 35 lines which are quotation, ἡ χάρις καλ occurs once, τὸ μέγεθος τῶν . . . 7 times, ἐπιμέλεια once, κηδεμονία 7 times, and κηδόμενος once; or in about 101 lines of the commentary on 2 Timothy, of which 26 are quotation, magnitudo occurs twice, gratia Spiritus twice, sollicitudo 3 times, and diligentia once. So in the Anaphora: 'the grace of the Holy Spirit' 40. 21 [32. 14], 44. 16 [37. 4], 46. 7 [38. 20]: 'the greatness of thine holiness' 42. 14 [34. 16]: 'Thou carest for the upholding of our life' 43. 4 [35. 12]. To these might be added, though it is less frequent, ἐνι σωτηρίᾳ (of . . .): in Hos. praef. 2; in Amos praef. 1 (bis), 2, 6; in Ionam praef. 4. So in the Anaphora, 'for the salvation of our life' 44. 18 [37. 5], 45. 7 [37. 20].

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN A CLUNIAC AND A CISTERCIAN

Before the historic controversy between the Cluniacs and the Cistercians finally lost its immediately practical interest, as it began to do not very long after the great protagonists had passed, St Bernard in 1153 and Peter the Venerable in 1158, it appears to have taken for a while a somewhat academic shape, as of a question gravely and dispassionately debated in the schools. It lost, in a measure, the verve of aggressive partizanship and became rather restrained, detached, almost Platonically detached. How far the Dialogue between a Cluniac and a Cistercian monk, given by Martène and Durand in their Thesaurus, is typical or otherwise it may be, as it often is in such cases, difficult to say, but it certainly is of the character suggested. Lists are opened and the disputants meet one another, courteously enough, with dialectic thrust and parry, and here and there a sally of grave humour or a homely witticism, as of friends who will presently meet outside and go home to a quiet meal together. The editors transcribed it from a MS at Morimond to which the abbot of that house had given them access, and which they assigned to the late twelfth or the early
